

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. #### MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. ANNIE

v.

GEORGE J. RIES, County Auditor, et al.,
Appts.

(123 Minn. 397, 143 N. W. 981.)

Judgment — fraud — collateral attack.

1. A domestic judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, in an action in which there is jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, is, until reversed or set aside, binding upon all parties to the action and their privies, and cannot be attacked for error or fraud except in a direct proceeding.

For other cases, see Judgment, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Records — Torrens law — void tax certificates.

2. In proceedings to register title, to which the holder of tax certificates on the land and the county where the land was situated were parties, the tax sales on which the certificates were issued were adjudged void for reasons that entitled the holder to refundment. It is held that such judgment cannot be attacked collaterally for error or fraud, and is, as against the county, conclusive of the right to refundment.

(November 14, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to compel the county auditor to issue to relator a warrant on the county treasurer for a certain amount in refundment of the amount paid by her for certificates of tax sales, with interest. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard D. O'Brien and Patrick J. Ryan for appellants.

Mr. Linnus O'Malley for respondent.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the county auditor of Ramsey county to issue to relator a warrant on the county treasurer for $226.27 in refundment of the amount paid by relator for certificates of tax sales, with interest. When the answer came in, relator moved for judgment on the pleadings. This motion was granted, and defendants appealed from the judgment directing a peremptory writ to issue.

The following facts are disclosed by the pleadings, upon which the order for judgment was based:

In May, 1908, lot 23, Hewitt's Outlots, First Division, and "west one half of the vacated portion of La Salle street adjoining the same," were sold to relator at a tax sale for $114.81. Lot 24 and the "east one half of the vacated portion of La Salle street adjoining the same" were at such sale sold to relator for $111.46. Certificates of sale were issued to relator, and she has ever since been the owner thereof. Prior to 1889, lots 23 and 24 abutted on La Salle street, which was vacated in that year by the common council of St. Paul.

In 1910 William G. White commenced a proceeding to register his title to the vacated portion of La Salle street between the two lots. R. C. Jefferson, the record owner of these lots, was made a party defendant, as was Annie C. Coburn, the relator here, as owner of tax certificates on the lots. The county of Ramsey was also made a party defendant in said proceeding.

Jefferson answered, claiming to be the owner in fee of the premises. Annie C. Coburn answered, claiming a lien on the premises by virtue of her tax certificates. The action or proceeding was tried, a decision rendered, and judgment entered on the decision. By this judgment the tax certificates of Annie C. Coburn were adjudged null and void, for the reason that no assessment or levy of taxes was ever made as a basis for the tax judgment pursuant to which the sales were made, and for the further reason that the taxes for which said sales were made had been paid before the sales. The county of Ramsey did not appeal from this judgment, and the time to appeal therefrom has expired. The defendant auditor has refused to issue to relator warrants in refundment of the amounts paid by her for the certificates.

The foregoing facts are alleged in the petition and admitted by the answer.

The following facts are alleged in the answer, and must be taken as true on the motion for judgment on the pleadings:

In the registration proceeding, defendant Jefferson and defendant Coburn appeared by the same attorney. Jefferson undertook to establish title in fee in himself, and Coburn to establish her lien by virtue of the tax certificates. It is alleged that the claims and interests of Jefferson and of Coburn were conflicting claims and interests. The certificates were attacked on the trial upon the grounds upon which they were held void as before stated. In truth and in fact, the taxes were lawfully levied, and the taxes had not been paid before sale. These facts were matters of public record, and open to the discovery of the relator; but she wrongfully failed, neglected, and omitted to present them to the court. By reason of this failure, neglect, and omission of the relator to show the facts, the court, upon the evidence before it, was compelled to find that no assessment or levy was ever made, and that the taxes had been paid before sale. In truth and in fact, the certificates of the relator are valid, and the judgment declaring them void was procured, as defendant alleges, "by relator, through relator's negligence, collusion, want of good faith, or fraud."

Is relator, on these allegations of the pleadings, entitled to refundment as a matter of law? Clearly the judgment in the White-Jefferson registration proceedings adjudged the tax sales void for reasons that under the statute (Rev. Laws 1905, §§ 963, 965) entitle the purchaser to a refundment, unless that judgment does not bind the county of Ramsey. The question, then, is whether, if the facts alleged in the answer are true, they are sufficient to make the

The county of Ramsey was a party to the registration proceedings and was served with the summons. It has not appealed from the judgment. The fraud, conceding, without deciding, that the allegations of the answer show fraud, was not in acquiring jurisdiction of the parties. It was at most a fraudulent failure to produce testimony that would have proved the tax sale valid. The rule is elementary that a domestic judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, in an action in which there is jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, is, until reversed or set aside, binding upon all parties to the action and their privies, and cannot be attacked for error or fraud except in a direct proceeding. Kipp v. Fullerton, 4 Minn. 473, Gill, 366; Cone v. Hooper, 18 Minn. 531, Gil. 476; Re Ellis, 55 Minn. 401, 23 L.R.A. 287, 43 Am. St. Rep. 514, 56 N. W. 1056; Oswald v. Minneapolis Times Co. 65 Minn. 249, 68 N. W. 15; Hall v. Sauntry, 72 Minn. 420, 71 Am. St. Rep. 497, 75 N. W. 720; Hinckley v. Kettle River R. Co. 80 Minn. 32, 82 N. W. 1088; Henry v. White, 123 Minn. 182, 143 N. W. 324.

The court, in the registration proceedings, had jurisdiction of the parties, of the subject-matter, and jurisdiction to grant the particular relief of adjudging void the Coburn tax sales. When the county was served, it knew or ought to have known who the parties to the proceeding were, what were their claims of interest in the land, and that the question of the validity of the Coburn tax sales was involved. It also must have known that if these sales were adjudged invalid the county might be called upon to refund the amount paid by the purchaser, with interest. It had the right and the opportunity of taking part in the proceedings and caring for its interests. Under the general principles of the law of collateral attack on judgments, it would seem clear that this judgment is binding upon the defendants here, and conclusively settles relator's right to refundment.

In none of the cases heretofore decided, involving the binding effect upon the city or county of a judgment declaring an assessment or tax sale void, was the city or county a party to the case in which the judgment was rendered. Even under those circumstances, it has been universally held that, in the absence of fraud, collusion, or mistake, the judgment conclusively settles the right to refundment. Easton v. Scofield, 66 Minn. 425, 69 N. W. 326; Willius v. St. Paul, 82 Minn. 373, 84 N. W. 1009; Otis v. St. Paul, 94 Minn. 57, 101 N. W. 1066, 1134. Under Easton v. Scofield, fraud in procuring the judgment declaring the sale invalid will defeat a refundment, where the city or county is not a party to the suit. This is recognized by the Willius and Otis Cases. But it is evident that this was so decided because the city or county was not a party to the action, and had no right or opportunity to take part in the proceedings therein.

The pleadings do not allege that the state of Minnesota was made a party to the registration proceedings. It could not be unless, in the opinion of the examiner, it had an interest in or lien upon the land. Rev. Laws 1905, § 3382 (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 6880); National Bond & Secur. Co. v. Hopkins, 96 Minn. 119, 104 N. W. 678, 680, 816. It does not appear that the state had any such interest or lien. But the county of Ramsey was made a party. It in no way raised the question of its not being a proper party. We can conceive of no interest that it had, save and except in the upholding of the Coburn tax certificates to prevent a judgment declaring the sales invalid that would give a right of refundment. Unlike the state, the county could be sued without its permission. It was sued, and had its opportunity to protect its interests by appearing and taking part in the proceedings. It is the county that seeks in this case to attack the judgment collaterally. We hold that the judgment in the registration proceedings is binding upon all the parties thereto, including the county of Ramsey, and is conclusive on the question of relator's right of refundment.

Judgment affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

EBEN S. S. KEITH et al.,

v.

JOHN KENNARD.

(222 Mass. 398, 110 N. E. 1030.)

Records — Torrens law — prescriptive title.

1. A title gained by prescription may be registered under the Torrens law.

For other cases, see Records and Recording Laws, III. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Adverse possession — maintenance of recreation camps.

2. Prescriptive title to real estate is acquired by cutting the timber from it, fencing it, and erecting upon it buildings for a recreation camp, which are kept locked and have been occupied at the owner's convenience two or three times each year for more than twenty years, the possession so maintained being at all times peaceable.

EXCEPTIONS by respondent to rulings of the Land Court for Plymouth County, made upon a petition for the registration of title to certain land, which resulted in a decree for petitioners. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin C. Jenney and Henry P. Herr for respondent.

Messrs. J. E. Norton Shaw and Albert B. Collins, for petitioners:

The southerly boundary of the Ralph

Jones deed, under which the respondent claims title, followed the shore of the White Island pond, did not cross Oliver's Neck, and therefore was excluded from the deed under which respondent claims, and included in the deed under which the petitioners claim title.

De Ponta v. Driscoll, 200 Mass. 225, 86 N. E. 308; Van Ness v. Boinay, 214 Mass. 340, 101 N. E. 979; Doon v. Felton, 203 Mass. 267, 89 N. E. 539; Com. v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 451; *Hall v. No exception lies to the ruling that "occupation under a claim of full record title since 1852, with nothing inconsistent thereto until the respondent asserted his theory or claim, about five years ago, makes a title proper for registration."

Note. — As to Torrens law, see annotation following RILEY v. PEARSON, post, 14. L.R.A.1916D.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners, to establish their right to registration, relied on title by prescription as well as by grant. The proof of title by grant required an examination of ancient records, surveys, and plans covering more than two centuries; and in the first request the respondent asked the judge to rule that "the petitioners have failed to establish that they are the owners in fee of the property described in the petition. . . ." It was refused, and, in so far as title by grant is involved, the questions raised by the refusal would compel a lengthy review of the evidence; portions of which were admitted subject to the respondent's exceptions. But as thus applied it is unnecessary to determine the correctness of this ruling, for reasons presently to be stated. A title gained by prescription would pass by deed, and for purposes of registration it cannot be distinguished from title by grant. Rev. Laws chap. 128, § 1; Butler v. Atty. Gen. 195 Mass. 79, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1047, 80 N. E. 688; First Nat. Bank v. Woburn, 192 Mass. 220, 78 N. E. 307. The record states that it appeared in evidence and the judge found as a fact that on June 8, 1852, by a duly recorded deed, the land in question was conveyed by one Gibbs to Josiah Folger, under whom, through mesne conveyances the petitioners claimed ownership. While it is further found that Gibbs did not have "full record title at the date of the conveyance," the evidence plainly shows that one Burgess, a predecessor of the petitioners, who obtained title in 1867, went upon the land in that year and also in 1868; cut the timber from both sides and all the timber from the narrow portion of "Oliver's Neck," the designation by which the tract in dispute has been known from Colonial times. The cutting took place in the presence of one Miller and one Tisdale, under each of whom the respondent alleges title. It was further shown that Burgess built a sledge road through the neck, kept the underbrush cut; and when, in 1873, he parted with the title, his grantees entered into possession and erected camp buildings, consisting of a stable, cabin, cookhouse and boathouse, which were kept locked, the owners only holding keys. The land, although not cultivated, was thereafter kept cleared around the buildings, and nearly thirty years ago the ancient wooden fence across the "Neck" was replaced by a wire fence with a gate, which has been maintained and the gate kept locked by the parties in possession.

The buildings ever since have been occupied two or three times each year for about a week for the purpose of hunting, fishing, rest, and recreation. It thus appears that for more than twenty years before the date of filing the petition, the petitioners and their predecessors, under the claim of a full record title, have occupied and improved the land without interruption by the respondent or those under whom he claims. The occupation having been open, peaceable, and adverse, the respondent's second and third requests that "the petitioners upon all the evidence have failed to establish that they had acquired the title to the property set forth in the petition by prescription," and that "upon all the evidence in this case the petition should be dismissed with costs," were rightly denied. It follows that the finding that a title proper for registration had been made out was warranted. Wales v. Coffin, 100 Mass. 177; Bigelow Carpet Co. v. Wiggan, 209 Mass. 542, 548, 549, 95 N. E. 938, and cases cited.

Exceptions overruled.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying a new trial of an action brought to foreclose a mortgage made by defendant Gould to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lloyd Peabody, for appellant:

Defendant Gould did not, by the registration proceedings and his certificate, acquire any title whatsoever to the land in question which he could assert against the plaintiff.

Baart v. Martin, 99 Minn. 197, 116 Am. St. Rep. 394, 108 N. W. 945; Riley v. Pearson, 120 Minn. 210, post, 7, 139 N. W. 361.

In actions affecting title, if the court never acquires jurisdiction of the true owner or other party in interest, his rights are not affected by the decree; those purchasing or otherwise dealing with the property, on the strength of the decree, do so at their peril; and if subsequently there must be a loss to one or the other claimant, the party who has bought the title tainted with fraud must be the loser.

Falconer v. Cochran, 68 Minn. 405, 71 N. W. 386.

The legislature has no power, either by the passage of an act for the registration of title or otherwise, to make a man's enjoyment of his property to depend on his taking notice of void proceedings.

Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, Gil. 358.

Mr. William G. White, in propria persona:

The basic principle of the Torrens system is the registration of the title to land. It is the creation of a new title, binding upon all the world, and must, of necessity, rest upon judicial proceedings. If the registration system has any value, the title thus created must be indefeasible.

Niblack, Analysis of the Torrens Systems, § 5; State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 57 L.R.A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571, 89 N. W. 175; Baart v. Martin and Riley v. Pearson, supra.

Judges of Ct. of Registration*, 175 Mass. 71, 51 L.R.A. 433, 55 N. E. 812.

The subject-matter of a registration proceeding is the state of the title to the land affected thereby.

State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 57 L.R.A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571, 89 N. W. 175; Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 33 L. ed. 918, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557; American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 55 L. ed. 82, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200.

Jurisdiction over the land and over all claimants thereto is obtained in the manner clearly pointed out by the statute.

If one who examines the record in a registration proceeding finds the same to be complete and perfect in every particular, and that, so far as is disclosed by the record itself, the summons itself has been served upon all known claimants, and that notice to all other persons has been given by publishing and mailing the summons, as required by law, he may safely conclude that the court has acquired jurisdiction to conclusively establish the title to the land affected thereby, and may rely thereon.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was to foreclose a mortgage made to plaintiff by defendant Gould. The trial resulted in a decision that defendant White was the owner of the real estate, free from any claim of plaintiff on account of his mortgage. Plaintiff appealed from an order denying a new trial.

The assignments of error attack the conclusions of law, but not the findings of fact, which may be summarized as follows: Gould owned a lot in St. Paul, and on December 1, 1908, executed and delivered to plaintiff a promissory note for $300, and a mortgage on the lot to secure the note. At the time the note and mortgage were delivered to plaintiff, Gould represented that he desired to register the title to the land, and requested plaintiff to refrain from recording the mortgage, promising that he would have the decree in the registration proceedings provide that the mortgage was a first lien on the premises. Plaintiff relied on these representations and did not record his mortgage. Gould made application to register his title, but did not, in the application or otherwise, disclose the fact that plaintiff owned a mortgage on the premises. Plaintiff was not made a party to the proceedings. The decree was thereafter duly entered, adjudging Gould to be the owner of the premises free from all encumbrances, and the premises were thereafter registered in the name of Gould, free and clear of the mortgage of plaintiff. Thereafter, and in furtherance of his purpose to defraud plaintiff, Gould conveyed the premises to defendant White, who paid a valuable consideration therefor. White had no knowledge or notice of the existence of the mortgage, and, in purchasing the premises, relied upon the decree and the certificate in the registration proceedings. As a part of the transaction, the owner's duplicate certificate, held by Gould, was surrendered to and canceled by the registrar of titles, who then registered the title in the name of defendant White, free from all encumbrances, caused the original certificate of registration to be entered and recorded, and delivered an owner's duplicate certificate to defendant.

We have, then, this case: The owner of land makes application to register his title, and fraudulently omits to disclose the existence of an unrecorded mortgage, or to make the mortgagee a party. The proceedings are in all respects regular, and a decree is entered that makes no mention of any mortgage. The owner then conveys the land for a valuable consideration to a purchaser who relies on the registration proceedings and has no notice or knowledge that there is a mortgage on the property. The question is: Does the purchaser take the title free from the lien of the mortgage?

This question must be and is answered in the affirmative. To hold otherwise would not only wholly destroy the indefeasible character of a Torrens title, but also give L.R.A.1916D.

an unrecorded conveyance priority as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration whose conveyance is first duly recorded, in direct opposition to the provisions of the recording act. Rev. Laws 1905, § 3357. If Gould had not registered his title, and White had, in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, purchased the land and recorded his deed, there can be no doubt that he would take the title free from the lien of an unrecorded mortgage of which he had no notice. It surely cannot be held that a decree in registration proceedings, regular in all respects, removes this protection of the innocent purchaser. It is admitted that nothing in these proceedings would cause one who examined them to suspect the existence of any lien, or fraud on the part of the applicant. It is difficult to see what would remain of the indefeasible character of a Torrens title if the decree is open to collateral attack as against one who purchases in good faith for a valuable consideration, and with nothing to put him on inquiry as to fraud on the part of the applicant. It would seem unnecessary to say again that the purpose of the statute (Rev. Laws 1905, § 3393) was to create an indefeasible title in the person adjudged to be the owner. The basic principle of the system is the registration of the title to land instead of registering only the evidence of such title. A title is created by the decree and certificate of registration. State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 57 L.R.A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571, 89 N. W. 175; Baart v. Martin, 99 Minn. 197, 116 Am. St. Rep. 394, 108 N. W. 945; Riley v. Pearson, 120 Minn. 210, post, 7, 139 N. W. 361.

Where the decree is procured by fraud, actual or constructive, as where claimants known to the applicant are not named as parties or served in the proceedings, it does not bind the claimants so omitted. If the want of jurisdiction due to the failure to serve known claimants appears affirmatively from the judgment roll itself, the judgment is void as against such claimants, and may be attacked collaterally. Riley v. Pearson, supra. But where neither in the proceedings themselves nor by the records the existence of an unnamed claimant is shown, though the applicant knows that there is such a claimant, the want of jurisdiction does not appear from the judgment roll itself, and the decree is not subject to collateral attack.

In Riley v. Pearson, the fact that known claimants were omitted appeared from the judgment roll itself, as well as from the records in the office of the register of deeds. No question of innocent purchaser was involved in that case. It may be correct, though we do not so decide, that a decree that is void and subject to collateral attack would not be validated by a transfer of the title to a purchaser, though he paid a valuable consideration, and had no actual notice of the facts which made the decree void. But where, as in the instant case, the fraud or want of jurisdiction does not appear from the judgment or the proceedings, and where such proceedings are absolutely regular on their face, one who purchases from the registered owner for a valuable consideration, in reliance upon the judgment, and without notice or anything to put him on inquiry, takes the title free from all "encumbrances and adverse claims, excepting only such estates, mortgages, liens, charges, and interests as may be noted in the last certificate of title in the office of the registrar." Rev. Laws 1905, § 3393.

Order affirmed.

WILLIAM C. RILEY, Resp't.,

v.

MARY H. PEARSON, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

Deed — construction — easement.

1. A deed of real estate construed, and held to convey to the grantee an easement of a passageway over the land of the grantor, and that such easement was permanent, and not limited to the life of the building on the premises.

For other cases, see Easements, II. a; III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

A PPEAL by defendant Mary H. Pearson from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial in a proceeding to register title to certain land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William G. White, for appellant:

A title duly and regularly registered under the Torrens system is indefeasible after the expiration of the period fixed by statute, unless the registration was obtained by fraud.

Baart v. Martin, 99 Minn. 197, 116 Am. St. Rep. 394, 108 N. W. 945.

And fraud within the meaning of the Torrens law is actual fraud, mala fides, or dishonesty of some sort.

Niblack, Analysis of Torrens Systems, § 144; Coleman v. Riria Puwhanga, 4 New Zealand L. R. 230; Matai v. Assets Co. 6 New Zealand L. R. 356.

One who seeks relief from a decree which was obtained by fraud must seek that relief in a direct action, and not in a collateral one.

Hoffman v. Superior Ct. 151 Cal. 386, 90 Pac. 939; Baart v. Martin, supra.

In the absence of fraud a registration decree creates a new and indefeasible title in the registered owner. The decree is binding upon all the world, and binds and concludes even residents of the state who were omitted from the summons.

Doyle v. Wagner, 108 Minn. 443, 122 N. W. 316; Baart v. Martin, 99 Minn. 197, 116 Am. St. Rep. 394, 108 N. W. 945; Reed v. Siddall, 94 Minn. 216, 102 N. W. 453; American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 55 L. ed. 82, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200.

Neither the applicant nor the defendant Daniel Aberle & Sons are in possession of Mary H. Pearson's premises simply because they have the right to use a portion of the same for ingress and egress from the yard room in the rear of their respective stores.

Baker v. Kelley, 11 Minn. 480, Gil. 358; State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 443, 57 L.R.A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571, 89 N. W. 175.

Even if defendant Daniel Aberle & Sons and the applicant, Riley, were in possession of the Pearson property when her registration decree was rendered, it would avail them nothing in this present proceeding. They can attack that decree, if at all, only in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose.

Messrs. Charles Bechhoefer and A. E. Horn, for respondent:

Persons who appear of record, or who are known to the applicant to have any title or interest, must be named as defendants, and if this requirement is not complied with, the judgment as to the person not named is void.

As this judgment was void by facts affirmatively appearing in the proceeding, no direct attack was necessary.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding under the so-called Torrens act to register the title to land in the city of St. Paul. A trial of the issues resulted in a decision that the applicant was entitled to have his title to the land, and to the easements referred to in the decision, registered in him. Defendant Mary H. Pearson moved for a new trial, and from an order denying such motion appealed to this court.

To the character and extent of the easements owned by plaintiff and defendant Daniel Aberle & Sons prior to the decree hereinafter mentioned; (2) to the effect of such decree on such easements. The material facts are as follows:

Alexander Paul, in his lifetime, was the owner of lots 8 and 9, block 26, St. Paul proper. He constructed upon this property a three-story stone building, divided into four separate stores. By his will Alexander Paul devised this property to his children, Charles Paul and Mary Paul, in equal shares. The will was probated in 1867, and the final decree, entered in 1881, assigned the property to the devisees named. Lots 8 and 9 have a frontage on East Third street of 116 feet, and a depth on Robert street of 150 feet. The store building covered the entire frontage of both lots on East Third street, but the division into stores was without any reference to lot lines. Store No. 1, located at the northeast corner of East Third and Robert streets, was constructed on the west 41.06 feet of lot 8. Stores numbered 2, 3, and 4 were located on the remainder of lot 8 and all of lot 9.

In 1881 commissioners appointed by the probate court to partition the estate of Alexander Paul filed their report, in which store No. 1 was assigned in severalty to Charles Paul, and stores Nos. 2, 3, and 4 were assigned in severalty to Mary Paul. In this report, which was confirmed by the court in April, 1881, and duly recorded, store No. 1, together with the land upon which it was located, was set off to Charles Paul, subject to the following easement: "Subject to the right of use of the arched alleyway through the rear end thereof by the owners and occupants and their heirs and assigns of said stores 2, 3, and 4 in said block, for ingress and egress from the same into and from the yard room in the rear of said block, so long as said building shall stand." The arched alleyway mentioned in the report leads from Robert street to the "yard room" in the rear of stores 2, 3, and 4. Store No. 1 extends the full length of the lot, and this alleyway is a driveway under the second story, with its sides and arched ceiling of stone. It is 10 feet wide on the ground and 16 feet high at the highest point of the arch, and extends the full width of store No. 1 to an open space in the rear of the other stores, which do not extend to the rear of the parcels on which they stand.

Mary Paul died, and her undivided half interest in the property was assigned by the final decree entered January 26, 1888, to the devisees named in her will, Emma and William Paul. On the next day there was recorded a deed from Charles Paul and wife to Emma Paul and William Paul. This deed, dated in November, 1887, purported to convey to the grantees the three stores which had been set off to Mary Paul in the partition proceedings in 1881. In this deed the easement granted was described as follows: "Together with the right of use of the arched alleyway in the rear of said most westerly store, for ingress and egress to and from the yard room in the rear of the stores standing on said lots 8 and 9."

The applicant, William C. Riley, and the defendant Daniel Aberle & Sons, have succeeded to the title and interest of Emma and William Paul in two of the stores and parcels of lots 8 and 9 which went to Mary Paul by the partition, Riley owning parcel No. 4 and Daniel Aberle & Sons parcel No. 3, and they are the present owners of the easements. Defendant Mary H. Pearson succeeded to the title of Charles Paul to parcel No. 1, on which store No. 1 and the arched alleyway stands.

The foregoing are the facts that bear on the question whether the easement of the applicant is permanent or endures only so long as the building stands. The facts that bear on the second question are as follows:

On April 24, 1906, Mary H. Pearson filed in the district court of Ramsey county her application to register the title to the west 41.06 feet of lots 8 and 9, block 26. After the usual reference to the examiner of titles, the latter, on May 8, 1908, filed his report, in which he reported that the applicant was the owner of record of the land sought to be registered, subject to the easement granted by the deed of November, 1887, from Charles Paul, which easement the examiner stated "does not appear to have ever been extinguished." He recommended that the owners and persons in possession of the remainder of lots 8 and 9, covered by the store building, be made defendants in the proceeding. The applicant did not, however, apply for the issuance of a summons in which these owners and persons in possession were named as defendants. Nothing appears to have been done in the proceedings until October 24, 1906, on which day the examiner filed a supplemental report, in which he stated that the title should be registered subject to the right of use of the arched alleyway by the owners and occupants, their heirs and assigns, of the store building, "so long as said building shall stand," and stated that, if this were done, it would not be necessary to make the owners and persons in possession of the remainder of lots 8 and 9 defendants in the proceeding.

for the issuance of a summons, and did not include among those to be named as defendants the owners of the remainder of lots 8 and 9 and the easement, who were, as before stated, William C. Riley and Daniel Aberle & Sons. Riley was at the time a resident of St. Paul, and Daniel Aberle & Sons was a corporation having its place of business and the residence of its officers in St. Paul. The summons was issued as applied for, and did not name as defendants either Riley or Daniel Aberle & Sons, and neither was ever served or notified of the proceedings. The summons was directed to certain named defendants, and to "all other persons or parties unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien, or interest, in the real estate described in the application herein." This summons was published as required by law, and the proceedings came on before the court, which made its decision finding that the applicant was the owner of the real estate described in the application, subject to the easement "so long as said store building shall stand," and directing the entry of judgment accordingly. Judgment was entered, which described the easement in the language of the findings, and ordered the register of titles to register applicant's title, subject to such easement and certain other encumbrances named. The title was so registered, and a certificate issued.

On these facts, the learned trial court decided that the applicant in this proceeding and defendant Daniel Aberle & Sons were the owners of a perpetual easement for a passageway through the arched alleyway, and that, not being parties to the Pearson registration proceeding, they were not bound or affected by the judgment in that proceeding, which declared their easement to be only "so long as said store building shall stand."

1. The first claim of appellant is that the easement is not perpetual, but continuous only "so long as the store building shall stand." If the character of this easement is to be determined by the terms of the partition decree in the estate of Alexander Paul, this is correct; but if the character and duration of the easement are to be determined by the terms of the deed of November, 1887, from Charles Paul to Emma and William Paul, we think it clear that the easement was perpetual. The language will not admit of any other construction. The easement was to each grantee, and to his "heirs and assigns forever," and was without limitation as to time. There is nothing to warrant the conclusion that if the building should be destroyed by fire or cyclone, or torn down to make way for a new structure, it was intended that the easement should terminate. And we hold that we must determine the nature and duration of the easement from the terms of the deed of November, 1887.

It is urged that this deed was merely confirmatory of the partition decree entered six years before; but there is no suggestion why this decree needed confirmation, and no explanation of why, if it did, Emma and William Paul did not give a deed to Charles confirming his title under the decree to parcel No. 1. Apparently the partition proceedings were entirely effective to convey to Mary Paul a complete title to parcels 2, 3, and 4, and to Charles Paul an equally good, but no better, title to parcel 1. The deed of 1887 recited a consideration of $30,000, which is perhaps a fact not of great weight, but rather suggestive of something more than a mere desire to confirm the partition decree and strengthen the final decree, which on the day the deed was filed for record was entered in Mary Paul's estate, and assigned to the grantees in the deed the identical property it conveyed, if applicant's position is correct. It seems much more reasonable to conclude that it was intended by the deed to convey something that the grantee did not already own. A permanent easement in the owners of parcels 2, 3, and 4 would evidently be of much greater value than the one they already possessed, limited by the life of a building which might at any time be destroyed or torn down to be supplanted by a more modern structure.

We hold that the deed conveyed an easement, and that this easement was permanent, not limited, as was the one granted by the partition decree. It follows that the trial court correctly held that, at the date of the commencement of the Pearson registration proceedings, William C. Riley and Daniel Aberle & Sons each owned a perpetual easement for the use of the arched alleyway over the rear of parcel No. 1. It may be noted here that parcel No. 2 is owned by a defendant who did not appear in this proceeding, and that the owner of parcel No. 3 has also an easement of passage over the rear of parcel No. 2, and the owner of parcel No. 4 an easement of passage over the rear of parcels Nos. 2 and 3, as well as the right to use the arched alleyway. Each of these easements is, by the terms of the deed creating it, a permanent one.

2. The serious and important question in the case is whether or not applicant and Daniel Aberle & Sons are bound by the Pearson registration decree, which adjudged their easements to be limited by the life of the building. That this judgment was erroneous we have already held; but, of course, that is, in this connection, unimportant. If it is binding on applicant, he cannot now claim a permanent easement. The L.R.A.1916D.

question is important, not only as it affects the validity of decrees under the Torrens law as against collateral attack, but as it affects owners of property which may be taken from them by legal proceedings of which they have no notice. We are anxious that a Torrens title be made one which will pass readily, without examination of the records to ascertain if the owner of the certificate had a title that was proper for registration, and without regard to that fact; but we are also anxious to announce no doctrine that will make it easy to deprive another of his property without an opportunity on his part to be heard. We conceive that considerations of public welfare do not demand that we "stretch the law" in order to sustain a Torrens title founded on a judgment rendered without due process of law.

The controlling facts, to which we must apply the law, are that, at the time the Pearson summons was applied for, William C. Riley and Daniel Aberle & Sons were the record owners of a perpetual easement over the land sought to be registered, and were openly in the enjoyment of such easement. The applicant had both constructive and actual knowledge of this fact; the deed creating the easement being on record, the owners being in possession, and the examiner of titles having, in his original report, found that an easement was created by the deed, and still existed, and having recommended that the owners of such easement be made parties defendant in the proceedings. Had there been no supplemental report of the examiner, suggesting that it was not necessary to make the owners of the easement parties, it could not be claimed that the decree would bind parties not joined or served, contrary to the recommendation in the original report. Dewey v. Kimball, 89 Minn. 454, 95 N. W. 317, 895, 96 N. W. 704; Baart v. Martin, 99 Minn. 204, 116 Am. St. Rep. 394, 108 N. W. 945. All that appellant has on which to base the argument that the judgment is binding is the statement in the supplemental report of the examiner that it would be unnecessary to join the owners of the easement if the decree registered the title subject to an easement limited to the life of the building.

Did this relieve the applicant from making parties to the proceeding the owners of an interest disclosed by the records and actually known by the applicant to exist? If this were not a Torrens law proceeding, if it were an action to quiet title, or to determine adverse claims, it would not for a moment be contended that the owner of a known lien or interest that appeared of record would be bound by a judgment unless he was made a party and served with the summons. But it is claimed that this is so under the Torrens law, or at least that such judgment binds everybody after the sixty days within which a person having an interest in the land, and who has not been actually served with process, may appear and file an answer. And we agree with this contention, except as we are asked to apply the rule to cases where the applicant has knowledge of the title, interest, or lien existing in another, and fails in his application or petition for summons, or otherwise, to disclose such knowledge. In the absence of fraud, actual or constructive, it is the law, as declared by the act itself and the decisions, that a decree of registration binds all the world. Those not specifically named as defendants are parties to the proceeding under the designation "all other persons or parties unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien, or interest, in the real estate described in the application herein," and served by publication. This is the effect of Baart v. Martin, 99 Minn. 197, 116 Am. St. Rep. 394, 108 N. W. 945, of Doyle v. Wagner, 108 Minn. 443, 122 N. W. 316, and of American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 55 L. ed. 82, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200. These cases, and especially the first named, appellant insists, control the case at bar, and compel the conclusion that the judgment in the Pearson proceedings is binding upon Riley and Daniel Aberle & Sons.

In Baart v. Martin the action was to foreclose a mortgage given by Martin to one Ernst and assigned to Baart. Ernst forged Baart's name to a power of attorney to foreclose the mortgage, and it was in form foreclosed, though there was no default in the mortgage. At the sale the property was bid in in the name of Baart, and thereafter Ernst forged Baart's name to a deed conveying the property to one Carl. Carl, though having knowledge of these facts, on December 15, 1903, made application to register title to the land under the Torrens law, which application was filed January 23, 1904, and referred to the examiner January 29, 1904, who reported an unencumbered fee title in Carl. Baart had no knowledge of the forged power of attorney, the attempted foreclosure, or forged deed, until in November, 1903. On January 2, 1904, he commenced the action to foreclose his mortgage. The summons was served on Carl February 7, 1904, and a notice of his pendens filed on March 3, 1904. March 5, 1904, Carl elected to proceed with his registration proceedings, and the summons was issued, served, and published. Though Carl then knew that Martin was the owner of the fee, and that Baart owned an unsatisfied first lien on the property, neither Martin nor Baart was named as a defendant L.R.A.1916D.

in the proceedings, which resulted in a decree registering the title in Carl as fee owner, and not mentioning Baart's mortgage. On these facts it was held that, as Carl knew that Baart claimed a mortgage lien on the land, it was necessary that the latter's name appear in the summons, and that, as he was not an "unknown party," the concealment of his claim is a fraud on the court, and "the decree therein entered is as to him of no force and effect." The conclusion that the decree was not binding on plaintiff because of the "fraud on the court" involved an exhaustive review of the authorities on the effect of a Torrens decree under the laws of different states and countries, and a decision that under our statute a decree and certificate procured by fraud, when the owner of the land is not notified as required by the statute, may be vacated and set aside, as long as the title remains registered in the name of the person guilty of the fraud, in an action brought by the defrauded party within a reasonable time after the discovery of the fraud. In other words, a decree and certificate so obtained by fraud do not give an indefeasible title. It is true that it was stated in the opinion that the purpose of the Torrens law was to create an indefeasible title in the person adjudged to be the owner, and that in the absence of fraud a Torrens decree is final, and we have no intention or desire to in any respect depart from this doctrine. But we by no means regard the case as conclusive in favor of appellant here. Indeed, it supports the position of respondent.

Doyle v. Wagner was an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, in which the defense was a decree registering the title under the Torrens system. The lien statement was filed before the registration proceedings were begun; but, owing to a mistake in the description of the property, it was not noted on the abstract or mentioned in the examiner's report, and the trial court found as a fact that the applicant at no time had any notice or knowledge of the existence of the lien. It was held that, the registration proceedings being regular, and there being no fraud, plaintiff was bound by the decree, though not named as a party, and though the decree did not recognize or establish the lien. It is clear that this case does not control the case at bar.

In American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 55 L. ed. 82, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200, the Federal Supreme Court had under consideration the validity of a statute of California, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Establishment and Quieting of Title to Real Property in Case of the Loss or Destruction of Public Records." Cal. Stat. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 78. This statute was passed at an extraordinary session of the legislature of California, called after the earthquake and fire in April, 1906, and its object was to restore the record title to land in San Francisco where the records had been destroyed by the great calamity. The act permitted an action by one in possession of property to establish his title. It required the plaintiff to make affidavit before the summons was issued that he does not know, and has never been informed, of any adverse claimants not named in the summons. It was held that this law did not deprive unknown claimants of their property without due process of law. The statute had been construed by the supreme court of California in Title & Document Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199, 88 Pac. 356, and in Hoffman v. Superior Ct. 151 Cal. 386, 90 Pac. 939, as requiring the complainant "to designate and to serve as known claimants all whom by reasonable diligence he could ascertain to be claimants," a construction which was said by Chief Justice White "in effect declared that the statute prohibited the omission of a known claim or claimant upon the conception that the rights of such claim or claimant would be foreclosed by the general designation and notice prescribed for unknown claimants." This construction enabled the court to hold the act constitutional, as, when so construed, it manifested "the careful purpose of the legislature to provide every reasonable safeguard for the protection of . . . unknown claimants, and to give such notice as under the circumstances would be reasonably likely to bring the fact of the pendency and the purpose of the proceeding to the attention of those interested."

It is apparent that the Zeiss Case is no authority for upholding a decree where a known claimant is omitted from the summons, and not served. Indeed, the reasoning of the opinion seems to indicate quite clearly that such a decree would not be binding upon the claimant omitted. The chief justice quotes from Hoffman v. Superior Ct. the statement that "failure of the plaintiff to make inquiry, or to avail himself of knowledge which would be imputed to him because of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry, as to the existence of adverse claims, would be available 'in any subsequent attack upon the decree, upon the ground that there was extraneous fraud of the plaintiff in making a false affidavit to obtain jurisdiction.'" That this language met the approval of the court in the Zeiss Case is evident. And in discussing the "adequacy of the proceedings pursued" in the Zeiss Case, it was stated that there was no claim that fraud, actual or constructive, was employed by Zeiss in obtaining the judgment complained of; in other words, Zeiss had no knowledge of the existence of adverse claims or claimants.

The cases we have above discussed do not hold that a registration decree is indefeasible when a known claimant is omitted from the summons, is not served, and has no notice of the proceedings; and we are aware of no case so holding. On the contrary, Baart v. Martin expressly holds that "when the name of a claimant is known to an applicant either from the report of the examiner, . . . or from other sources, the summons cannot be served on such claimant by publication, unless his name appears in the summons," and that "the concealment of his claim is a fraud on the court, and the decree therein entered is as to him of no force and effect." The other cases referred to, by necessary implication, announce the same doctrine. Indeed, no other conclusion seems possible under the language of the act requiring the applicant to set forth in his application the names of all parties who "appear of record or are known to the applicant to have or to claim any right, title, estate, lien, or interest in the land," and requiring the order for summons to contain the name and address, so far as known, of every person named in the application or found by the examiner as having any such right, title, interest, estate, or lien. State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 57 L.R.A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571, 89 N. W. 175; Ware v. Easton, 46 Minn. 180, 48 N. W. 775; Dewey v. Kimball, 89 Minn. 454, 95 N. W. 317, 895, 96 N. W. 704.

We do not understand counsel for appellant to question this. He admits that, if the applicant fails to disclose to the court the existence of a claim or claimant known to him, this is a fraud upon the court, and that the decree may be set aside in a direct action for that purpose. But he claims that it is not shown that the applicant knew of the easements claimed by Riley and Daniel Aberle & Sons, and that in any event there must be a direct action to set aside or modify the decree.

3. It may be that Mary Pearson had no actual personal knowledge of the duration of the easements claimed. But her attorney had. He may have considered that legally the easements were not permanent, but he knew all the facts, or at least is charged with such knowledge,—the examiner's first report, the deed of record, the fact of possession, if it may be so called. Clearly the applicant is charged with the knowledge acquired by her attorney. It is not clear why the recommendations in the original report were not followed, why the supplemental report was made, or what influenced the examiner to change his opinion. But certainly the astute and able counsel knew every fact relating to the claims of the owners of parcels 2, 3, and 4, and it is immaterial if he still considered that the easements continued only so long as the store building should stand. We do not believe for a moment that there was any intent to commit a fraud on the court. The high character of the counsel is sufficient evidence to rebut any inference that might otherwise be drawn from the facts. But such actual intent or purpose to defraud the claimant is not necessary. We think that constructive fraud is sufficient, and that the omission to disclose the adverse claims was such a fraud upon the court. The use of the term "fraud" in this connection is perhaps unfortunate, naturally implying, as it does, moral turpitude and bad faith. It is the fact itself that a known claimant was not made a party or served that makes the judgment not binding upon him, rather than any bad faith in concealing the existence of the claim or claimant.

It is insisted that the applicant disclosed to the court all the facts upon which the character of the easement depended, including the deed by which it was created. It is certainly true that the first report of the examiner disclosed this deed, and that it was referred to in the abstract. But it may be noted that this information did not come from the applicant, and we are not prepared to hold that the fact that it was possessed by the court, or, more accurately, that the facts were disclosed in the files of the case, relieved applicant of the duty of doing anything further to disclose the names of claimants. The fact still remains that neither in the application, nor in the petition for the summons, was any mention made of the easements claimed by Riley and Daniel Aberle & Sons. It is, of course, the duty of the court to determine what parties shall be named as defendants in a registration proceeding: but it is not to be expected that the court can or should do this without the aid of the applicant and the examiner. Had the applicant disclosed the fact that the deed granted a perpetual easement, and that Riley and Daniel Aberle & Sons were the record owners of such easement, in the actual enjoyment thereof, all facts within the applicant's knowledge, it would not be necessary now to claim that the court, not the applicant, was responsible for the failure to name the owners in the summons.

4. It is strenuously insisted that the decree is binding in any event until set aside or modified in a direct proceeding brought for such purpose. This would clearly be true in case of fraud that did not go to the question of the jurisdiction of the court over the parties. But this is a case where, as we have held, the court never acquired jurisdiction over the persons who are now insisting that the decree is not binding upon them. And this want of jurisdiction appears affirmatively from the judgment roll itself. The rule applicable to such a case is well settled; that is, such a judgment is a nullity as to those not parties to it, and may be attacked collaterally. Kanne v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 33 Minn. 419, 23 N. W. 864; Jewett v. Iowa Land Co. 64 Minn. 531, 58 Am. St. Rep. 555, 67 N. W. 639; 2 Dunnell's Minn. Digest, § 5141. We see no reason why this rule should not apply to a judgment in a Torrens proceeding, as well as in any other action. We fully agree that a Torrens certificate based upon a decree in a proceeding in which the law as to naming and serving known claimants is complied with gives, in the absence of fraud, an indefeasible title, and is not merely evidence of the title which the applicant had before the decree. All claimants unknown to the applicant, and not named in the examiner's report, are parties to the proceeding as "unknown parties;" but where it affirmatively appears that claimants known to the applicant or named by the examiner are not made parties, the decree is not binding on such claimants, and may be attacked collaterally. Any other conclusion would go far to remove the safeguards which make the law constitutional. It would make a strong argument for holding that the act was invalid, because the proceedings provided do not constitute due process of law. In its last analysis the case reduces itself to the plain proposition that no man can be deprived of his property without notice and an opportunity to be heard. We may call the attempt to do this fraud, or we may say it was a mistake; but the result is the same,—a judgment claimed to be binding against known owners of an interest in the land, who were not made parties or served with summons, and who had no actual notice of the suit.

We have considered very carefully the able arguments and briefs of counsel, and our conclusions are in harmony with those reached by the trial court.

Order affirmed.

I. Introductory.

This note deals with the American cases on the Torrens law (including the Hawaiian and Philippine cases); it is also attempted to include such foreign cases as are of general importance, as distinguished from those of local or temporary interest. "American," as used in this note, includes Hawaiian and Philippine matters.

The Torrens system takes its name from Robert (afterwards Sir Robert) Torrens, who drew the first "Torrens" law, which was enacted in South Australia in 1858. The system spread to the other Australian colonies and other British possessions, and to England itself, and modifications of it have been L.R.A.1916D.

adopted in several American jurisdictions.

The purpose of the Torrens law is that there shall be in the registrar's office a page of a book containing the facts of the title of each piece of property, which page shall be the title to the property, and shall be conclusive; so that an intending purchaser or mortgagee may go to the registrar's office, examine the page, and at once with safety take a deed or mortgage from the owner of the property, file it, and have himself accordingly registered upon the page as owner or mortgagee. This page is known as the certificate of title.<sup>1</sup>

The theory, of course, is an ideal; the practical question is how far it can be accomplished. The title is to be set down on the page of the registrar's book or certificate of title, and is to be registered in the name of a person. It is to be stated to be subject to such liens, etc., as are specified. But, on reflection, it will be seen that such a certificate is not entirely conclusive; there are other things to be excepted, and these, or some of them, the acts in general endeavor to provide for. For example, the especial difficulty is fraud; the certificate is not conclusive in the face of fraud, and statutes attempting to say that taking a title with notice of an outstanding interest is not a fraud break down utterly when they come for construction before the courts, as may be seen by the cases in the English colonies. Again, what is to be done where the property described in the certificate is already registered in the name of another person on another page of the register? What is to be done about easements? And are they to be on the certificate of the servient or dominant tenement? And what is the effect of a certificate on one in adverse possession when it was granted? Other difficulties appear as the matter develops.

For the accomplishment of the purpose of the system, it is the general theory of most, if not all, of the non-American acts, that all registered lands should be presently alienable, so that trust lands shall be registered in the trustees as absolute owners.

In a few jurisdictions the system adopted contemplates the registration of more than one kind of title; as in the Hawaiian, English, and one or two other acts, of an absolute, a possessory, or a qualified title; or, in the British Columbia act, of absolute fees or indefeasible fees.

The system involves, of course, in the first place, the initial registration of title, or, as it is called, "bringing the land under the act," and, second, subsequent matters. The fundamental distinction between the foreign and American acts is that in the foreign acts the land is brought under the act by what is, in general, an administrative matter by the registrar,—though it has been held that in some cases he acts judicial-ly,—and there are provisions for judicial relief; while, under the American acts, the initial registration is a formal proceeding or suit in a court of justice; the only American act which did not so provide was overthrown as unconstitutional in that it conferred judicial powers upon the registrar.<sup>2</sup> In the American acts we are, of course, confronted in limine with constitutional questions. As a result of what has been said above, and the comparative newness of the matter here, most of the American cases have arisen in proceedings for original registration, and scarcely any of them pass directly upon matters subsequent to registration of title. The foreign acts are of considerable variety.

The system in America.

Constitutional provisions with reference to the system have been adopted in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, and will be found in a note to subdiv. II., infra. Torrens acts have been passed in the following American jurisdictions, viz.: California, 1897; Colorado, 1903; Illinois (1895, declared invalid and new act passed in) 1897; Massachusetts, 1898; Minnesota, 1901; Mississippi, 1913; New York, 1908; North Carolina, 1913; Ohio (1896, declared invalid and new act passed in) 1913; Oregon, 1901; Washington, 1907; Hawaii, 1903; the Philippines, 1902. There have been numerous amendments to these acts. The American acts vary considerably in detail, and in Massachusetts, Hawaii, and the Philippines the registration is committed to a court of land registration. While there are a good many American cases on the subject, they have hardly, as yet, done more than touch the surface of it.

II. Constitutional questions.

a. In general.

The cases upon constitutional questions are not numerous, and have, in general, been raised, even if formally, in a technical or academic manner. One cannot but feel that there remains something to be said upon a constitutional question when it has yet to be urged by a litigant who is complaining that his property has been lost by reason of a violation of his constitutional right. The most important of these questions, of course, is that of jurisdiction of the court to render a judgment binding an owner who was not personally served. As heretofore stated, constitutional provisions in regard to registration of titles have been adopted in Ohio,<sup>3</sup> in Pennsylvania,<sup>4</sup> and in Virginia.<sup>5</sup> These provisions have not yet been construed by the courts. Copies of them are given in the notes.

the Torrens system is to secure to the owner an absolute, indefeasible title, free from all encumbrances and claims whatsoever, except those mentioned in the certificate of title; and, so far as it is possible, to make the certificate issued to the owner by the court, absolute proof of such title." L.R.A. 1916D.

As heretofore stated, the most important constitutional question under these acts is whether the judgment in a registration proceeding is subject to the objection that it deprives persons not personally served with notice of their property without due process of law. This question presents various phases as affecting unknown persons, wherever they may be, known nonresidents, known persons within the state, and the occupant, if there be any occupant other than the applicant. A study of the cases sustaining the acts seems to leave it at least doubtful how far the courts in Illinois, Massachusetts, and Minnesota have intended to sustain the various acts as regards the foregoing question.

It will be seen that the validity of the acts is grounded more or less by the courts upon the view that the registration proceeding is, as the acts in general provide, a proceeding in rem, and that in the views hereafter given of the Ohio court and of Loring, J. (dissenting), in the Tyler Case in Massachusetts, the proceeding cannot be one in rem. In this connection the reader is referred to the note to Pinney v. Providence Loan & Invest. Co. 50 L.R.A. 597, for a discussion as to whether a seizure of the property alone in a proceeding in rem will give jurisdiction without some form of notice.

The following may be taken as a suggestion towards the solution of the problem: First, the state has jurisdiction of all property within its boundaries. Second, the power of the state over property does not enable it to deprive anyone of his property without due process of law. Third, the presence within the state of property gives the court no jurisdiction over it. Fourth, due process of law requires that the state may authorize the court to proceed against property in rem only on giving reasonable notice of its purpose to deal with such property, including actual or constructive seizure of the property itself; and the court obtains no jurisdiction to deal with the property except by proceeding according to the enabling statute.

But, in any event, it is not easy to reconcile ourselves, for example, to the case of a remainderman, who, confident in his future enjoyment of his property, pays no attention to it during the intervening life estate, but pursues his calling in distant parts of the country, only to find, on the death of the life tenant, that, during such intervening estate, his own property has been irretrievably taken from him and powers hereby provided for into effect by such existing courts as may be designated by the legislature, and by the establishment of such new courts as may be deemed necessary. In matters arising in and under the operation of such system, judicial powers, with right of appeal, may be conferred by the legislature upon county recorders and upon other officers by it designated. Such laws may provide for continuing the registering, transferring, insuring and guarantying such titles after the first or original registration has been perfected by the court, and provision may be made for raising the necessary funds for expenses and salaries of officers, which shall be paid out of the treasury of the several counties."

<sup>3</sup> Constitution of Ohio, article 2, § 40, adopted September 3, 1912: "Laws may be passed providing for a system of registering, transferring, insuring and guarantying land titles by the state or by the counties thereof, and for settling and determining adverse or other claims to and interests in, lands the titles to which are so registered, insured or guaranteed, and for the creation and collection of guaranty funds by fees to be assessed against lands, the titles to which are registered; and judicial powers with right of appeal may by law be conferred upon county recorders or other officers in matters arising under the operation of such system."

without actual notice, and that his "day in court" has ceased to exist. Nor can the excellences of the system inspire a haste to adopt it in those who have lived long enough to recognize that the present day and generation has but little patience with the individual rights for which the original draftsmen of our constitutions were so solicitous.

The Ohio acts of 1896 and the Illinois acts of 1897 are the only American Torrens acts to be declared invalid. The first decision of the question was in State ex rel. Monnett v. Guilbert,<sup>6</sup> holding that the statute of Ohio of 1896 was unconstitutional as violating the constitutional provision that "every person, for an injury done him in his land, goods, person or reputation shall have remedy by due course of law." The act provided for notice by publication and mailing, and for personal service on residents of the county, and declared that "the decree of the court ordering registration shall be in the nature of a decree in rem." The court pointed out that the notice to be served under the act (and which was to be addressed "To whom it may concern") was not a summons, and that it did not contain the names of the persons to be served, and that while the application was required to contain the name and address of adjoining owners and the name of the occupant, if the land was occupied, and the name of the holder of all easements and inferior estates of any kind, in law or in equity, it did not require that one known to claim the title of the land in fee simple adversely to the applicant should be named or notified, although his residence might be within the county and known. The court said, inter alia: "To say that the legislature may prescribe such notice as is appropriate to proceedings in rem, and thus invest the proceedings with that character, is to affirm its power to annul the constitutional requirement. In this aspect of the case, and considering the effect of registration upon interests adverse to those of the applicant, the proceeding to register does not, in any substantial respect, differ from a suit which timet to settle title. It bears the least possible analogy to a proceeding in rem. The res is not taken into the possession of an officer of the court. No charge or lien is asserted against it. It is not to be sold with a view to the distribution of its proceeds, and it partakes, therefore, less of the nature of a proceeding in rem than does the foreclosure of a mortgage. . . . Except when the land is occupied by one who claims adversely to the applicant, the questions determined in registration are such as, both before and since the adoption of the Constitution, have been determined by courts of equity; and their decrees, much more distinctly than the judgments of courts of law, operate upon persons."<sup>7</sup>

After the decision in People ex rel. Kern v. Chase (Ill.) supra,<sup>8</sup> a new Torrens act was passed in Illinois in 1897, making the proceeding for registration a judicial proceeding or suit, the application to be to a court of chancery, and requiring that there be made parties thereto the occupant, if other than the applicant; the holder of any lien or encumbrance; other persons having any estate or claiming any interest in the land, in law or in equity, in possession, remainder, reversion, or expectancy. All other persons were to be made parties defendant by the name and designation of "all whom it may concern." A summons was to issue against all persons mentioned as defendant, and was to be served as in other cases in chancery. Notice was also to be published and mailed to other defendants substantially as in other chancery cases, and the court might direct further notice to be given. This act was sustained in People ex rel. Deneen v. Simon.<sup>9</sup> although the court considered that it might not be entirely free from objection. Thus, it was there held that an act providing for the registration of land titles after they are established in a court of equity might be upheld as against all upon whom service of process has been properly made, although it contains a void provision permitting judgment against a resident of the state, notified only by publication; and also that the provision making a judicial determination of title to land forever binding and conclusive upon all persons after the lapse of two years might be given effect against parties to the proceeding and persons who must bring legal proceedings to establish their rights, although it would be void in favor of persons in possession of all they claim who were not parties to the proceeding.<sup>10</sup>

The Massachusetts statute passed in 1898 provided for a proceeding in a court of registration; the application was to state the name and address of the occupant, if there was one, and to give the names and addresses, so far as known, of the occupants of all lands adjoining. After an examination by an examiner, who was to report to the court, the recorder, if the proceeding was continued by the applicant, was to publish a notice by order of the court, to be addressed by name to all persons known to have an adverse interest and to the adjoining owners and occupants so far as known, and to all whom it might concern; a copy was to be mailed to every person named in the notice whose address was known, and a copy posted on the land; further notice might be ordered by the court. It was also provided (by the amendment of 1899) that the proceeding should be one in rem. It will be noticed that there is no requirement for personal service. In Tyler v. Judges of Ct. of Registration<sup>11</sup> the court denied a petition for a writ of prohibition against the judges of the court of registration established by the act, to prohibit them from proceeding further in registering the title to a certain parcel of land and determining the boundaries between it and an adjoining parcel belonging to the petitioner, who claimed that the original registration provided for by the act would deprive all persons, except the registered owner of any interest in the land, of property without due process of law; that the statute gave judicial powers to the recorder and assistant recorders after the original registration, although they were not judicial officers under the Massachusetts Constitution; and that there being no provision for notice before registration of transfers or dealings subsequently to the original registration, the effect was to deprive persons of their property without due process of law. It is to be regretted that the writer of the opinion of the majority of the court confused the actual decision by expressing at length what are confessedly his own individual views on the general subject, which, so far as we can judge, are not in accord with those of the majority of the court. This opinion, therefore, is in general not to be taken as authoritative except where he says: "For the purposes of decision, a majority of the court prefer to assume that in cases in which, under the constitutional requirements of due process of law, it heretofore has been necessary to give to parties interested actual notice of the pending proceeding by personal service or its equivalent, in order to render a valid judgment against them, it is not in the power of the legislature, by changing the form of the proceeding from an action in personam to a suit in rem, to avoid the necessity of giving such a notice, and to assume that, under this statute, personal rights in property are so involved, and may be so affected, that effectual notice, and an opportunity to be heard, should be given to all claimants who are known, or who, by reasonable effort, can be ascertained."<sup>12</sup> Loring, J. (with whom Lathrop, J., concurred), dissented on the ground that the notice provided for was not sufficient; that one not personally notified was not given the right to have the judgment vacated on a writ of review; that "no person is barred by a judgment or decree in a proceeding the effect of which is to strip him of vested rights of property, unless he is named as a defendant;" that the act could not be valid as one starting the statute of limitations against an owner in possession; that the proceeding could not be supported unless it was one in rem; and that it was not one in rem. He said, inter alia, that the test of a proceeding in rem "is not, Are all the world barred? but it is: Is it a proceeding to enforce a liability for which the res is liable, irrespective of who owns it,—such a liability that the res can be of the Torrens act, such as was discussed in Tyler v. Judges of Ct. of Registration (Mass.) supra. It is nearer to law than to equity, and is an assertion of legal title; but we think it unnecessary to put it into either pigeonhole." Carifio v. Philippine Islands (1909) 212 U. S. 449, 55 L. ed. 594, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, reversing (1906) 7 Philippine, 132.

properly impleaded as the respondent who is liable? If it is, then a proceeding in rem lies, and all the world are barred; but if it is not such a proceeding, and is a proceeding to enforce an ordinary right of lien or of property only, the proceeding is not in its nature a proceeding in rem, and the legislature cannot make it so by providing that all the world shall be barred."<sup>13</sup> The case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of error, by the applicant for the writ of prohibition, and that court held that the plaintiff in error could not raise the question as to the unconstitutionality of the act as lacking in notice where he himself had actual notice of the proceedings, although not a party to them; that is to say, he could not raise the question to the extent that his writ of error would be within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States.<sup>14</sup> Four of the judges dissented on the ground that the objection of the applicant was not as to the jurisdiction of the court over him personally, but as to its jurisdiction over the subject-matter.<sup>15</sup>

The Minnesota Torrens act of 1901 was held not unconstitutional as depriving persons of their property without due process of law in State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall.<sup>16</sup> That act provided that notice as to all known residents having claims or known to have any interest or claims to the land must be given by the service of a summons; nonresidents and unknown persons to be cited by publication, and in the case of known nonresidents, also by mailing; the decree to be conclusive upon all the world, except that persons having an interest and not served or notified may appear and answer within sixty days after entry of such decreed, if no innocent purchaser for value had acquired an interest; and such decree was not to be opened by reason of absence, infancy, or other disability, or any proceedings at law for reversing the judgment, except as is provided in the act; the sixty-day appeal was not to apply where there was an innocent purchaser for value who had acquired an interest, and in such case the party aggrieved must look to the assurance fund mentioned in the act, and to any person who had procured the decree by fraud.<sup>17</sup> The court, however, pointed out that "it is reasonably clear, and we so hold, that the particular provision of the act which, in effect, forbids the commencement or the defense, in opposition to the decree, of any action or proceeding to recover the land, brought more than sixty days after the entry of the decree, does not apply to an adverse claimant in the actual possession of the land, upon whom the summons is not served; for, being in possession, he cannot bring such an action, and his right to defend his possession and title in such a case cannot be made to depend upon his nonaction;" and said: "So construed, the provision of the act, both as to the opening of the decree and as to the commencement of any action or proceeding to recover the land in opposition to the decree, is valid as a statute of limitations."<sup>18</sup>

In Robinson v. Kerrigan<sup>19</sup> it was held that the California (Torrens) act of 1897, disposing of the claims to property of persons whose claims and existence were not known, with no notice save by publication, did not deprive such persons of their property without due process of law, nor did it fail to afford to such persons the equal protection of the laws.<sup>20</sup> for the hearing of a petition filed in such court to obtain registration of certain lands, as provided in the act of 1897. The defendant had refused to make the order, basing his refusal upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional and void, and the supreme court observed that "the validity of the act is the sole question presented for our consideration," and directed that the writ of mandate issue.

In Title & D. Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, the court had under consideration the statute of California passed after the earthquake of 1906, known as the "McInerney act," providing for the bringing by the person in actual possession of an action in rem to determine the title of real property in cases where the official records had been Occupant not notified.

There has been one case in which the question has directly arisen whether an occupant not notified is bound by the decree, and whether such a decree binding him would be due process of law. This case arose in the Philippines, and it was held that the occupant of the land was not entitled to open a decree for registration, although he had not been named in the proceedings, and the statute required that the application should name the occupant, those applying for registration having omitted him because they honestly believed that he occupied the lands simply as their tenant, and that therefore it was unnecessary to name him.<sup>21</sup> It was held that the occupant was not deprived of his property without due process of law, in violation of the act of Congress of July 1st, 1902, known as the Philippine bill, which provides "that no law shall be enacted in the said Islands which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," as the proceeding for registration was one in rem, and the occupant was made a party by publication, the statute particularly providing that the decree should be conclusive upon and against all persons, whether mentioned by name or included in the general description, "to all whom it may concern."<sup>22</sup> lost, and providing for service by publication and by mailing and by posting of notices on the property, and for personal service on those found within the state, claiming adverse interests, and that the judgment should conclude those claiming estates in the property at the time of the commencement of the action, or those claiming under them. The court held that the proceeding was not one strictly in rem, but was one quasi in rem, and that the effect of such a judgment, both as to those parties known and included and as to unknown parties, was not such as to deprive them of their property without due process of law.

The same "McInerney act" was also sustained in American Land Co. v. Zeiss (1910) 219 U. S. 47, 65 L. ed. 82, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200, where there is an interesting opinion, but one which is to be used with caution, at least, in so far as the Torrens acts are concerned, on account of the differences between those acts and the "McInerney act."

c. Objection to title of act.

A Torrens act entitled, "An Act Concerning Land Titles," does not fail in the constitutional requirement that its subject shall be clearly expressed in its title.<sup>23</sup>

Nor does an act of this character violate the provision of a state Constitution that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title," when the title of the act is, "An Act for the Certification of Land Titles and the Simplification of the Transfer of Real Estate," although the act contains provisions relating to the felonies, county officers, county government, principal and surety, attorneys at law, judgments, liens, procedure, and adverse claims, as all of the subjects thus treated are germane to the general subject expressed in the title.<sup>24</sup>

d. Objection that act is special or local.

A Torrens act is not unconstitutional as special because it contains special provisions regarding the statute of limitations and the rights of purchasers in good faith, and other matters peculiar to the lands which are brought within its provisions.<sup>25</sup>

Nor is such an act invalid as local because it applies only to counties where adopted,<sup>26</sup> nor void as special because it was only to apply to counties having more than a certain population.<sup>27</sup>

<sup>24</sup> Robinson v. Kerrigan (1907) 151 Cal. 40, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 90 Pac. 129, 12 Ann. Cas. 829, so holding as to the California act of 1897.

In Tower v. Glos (1912) 256 Ill. 121, 99 N. E. 876, where it was contended that the (Torrens) act was local because it applied only to counties where adopted, and that only the county of Cook had adopted it, the court replied: "Whether a law is local or general in its application is determined by whether or not it applies alike to all persons or classes under like circumstances and conditions. This act applies only to those counties adopting it by vote of the people. All counties may adopt it, and when it is adopted it applies to all counties alike. Its application depends upon the vote of the people, but not its constitutionality. Numerous acts having similar provisions have been before this court and have been upheld."

The provision of a state Constitution that all laws relating to courts should be general and of uniform application is not violated by a provision that "the examiner may receive in evidence any abstract of title or certified copy thereof, made in the ordinary course of business by makers of abstracts; but the same shall not be held as more than prima facie evidence of title, and any part or parts thereof may be controverted by other competent proofs;" and the court cannot say that the legislature acted unreasonably in providing for a rule of evidence applicable to the proceeding without extending it to all other forms of action in which the title to real estate is involved.<sup>28</sup>

A Torrens act is not unconstitutional as committing to the judicial department of the state functions not judicial in character, but purely administrative and executive, contrary to a provision of state constitutions prohibiting one department of state from exercising functions belonging to another.<sup>29</sup> Nor is the proceeding nonjudicial because it may be undefended.<sup>30</sup> Such an act does not devolve executive duties upon the court on account of the section which provides: "All acts performed by registrars . . . under this law shall be performed under rules and instructions established and given by the district court having jurisdiction of the county in which they act."<sup>31</sup> Nor does the act make the court a registration office by conferring upon it certain judicial duties incident to the registering of land titles.<sup>32</sup> providing for the Torrens system of registration, was not void for that reason as special legislation against the Minnesota Constitution.

Followed in National Bond & Secur. Co. v. Hopkins (1905) 96 Minn. 119, 104 N. W. 678, 680, 816, where the court, in overruling a similar objection to the constitutionality of § 13 of the act as to the preliminary reference to an examiner, etc., held that its constitutionality was not to be determined independently, but rested upon the validity of the law as a whole.

Neither is the power conferred upon the court to appoint examiners of titles an executive power; as judicial power includes the authority to appoint all necessary subordinate officers and assistants essential to the conducting of judicial business.<sup>33</sup>

f. Objection that act gives judicial power to the registrar.

An act confers judicial powers upon the registrar which provides that he shall examine into the facts, and, if satisfied that the facts stated in the application are true, and that the applicant is the owner of the land, or interested therein, as set forth in the application, he shall issue a certificate of title, otherwise he shall dismiss the application; and the registrar acts judicially under such a statute, although the only effect of the statute might be to start running the statute of limitations which is provided for, — namely five years.<sup>34</sup>

The modern acts have been particularly attacked on the ground that the registrar (or recorder) was given judicial power, to be exercised subsequent to the original registration. The only successful attack of this kind was in Ohio, where the court, in overthrowing the act on other grounds, also considered it invalid as conferring judicial powers on the recorder, the principal of which it summarized as follows: "The principal powers conferred are to take proof after notice to the holder that a mortgage has been discharged, and, after a hearing, to enter a discharge upon the register; to make an entry that a lien has become inoperative in law by reason of limitation of time when application has been made therefor, the person interested notified, and he is satisfied that such is the fact; to correct memorials made or issued by mistake, if the rights of a bona fide purchaser or lien holder for value have not intervened."<sup>35</sup>

Similar objections have not availed elsewhere. Thus it has been held that there was no force to such an objection where the statute required the registrar to note upon the duplicate certificate of title in his office the existence and general character of instruments creating liens, encumbrances, trusts, powers, or leases affecting the land described in the certificate.<sup>36</sup> Nor is the Constitution infringed by a statute requiring the registrar to make certain entries when it appears to him that the person intending to create a charge on property "has the title and right to create such charge," and that the person in whose favor it is to be made "is entitled by the terms of the act to have the same registered,"—especially where a party aggrieved is given by the act the right to apply to a court of equity for relief;<sup>37</sup> nor by another provision of the same statute that "upon its being made to appear to the registrar that the transferee [evidently intending 'transferor'] has the title or estate proposed to be transferred and is entitled to make the conveyance, and that the transferee has the right to have such estate or interest transferred to him, he shall make out and register as hereinbefore provided, a new certificate," etc.;<sup>38</sup> nor by the duties imposed upon the registrar in case of a tax sale or judgment or levy under an attachment or execution, or in case of a mechanics' lien, where, upon the filing of the proper certificate, he is to enter a memorial thereof upon his record, and in case the lien ripens into a title, the former certificate of title is canceled and a new one issued to the proper party;<sup>39</sup> nor is judicial power conferred upon the registrar by a statute permitting him to record a transfer of land held in trust upon the written opinion of two examiners that the transfer is in accordance with the true intent and meaning of the trust, which registration shall be conclusive in favor of the grantee, as such a statute merely abrogates the rule which requires the purchaser of trust property to see to the application of the purchase money, and does not confer judicial power upon the registrar.<sup>40</sup>

The act does not make registrars judicial officers where it provides that their acts shall be performed under the rules and instructions established and given by the court.<sup>41</sup>

That these are judicial powers is entirely clear. They seem to have been so regarded by the general assembly, for there is a provision for appeal from decisions of the recorder."

In Tyler v. Judges of Ct. of Registration (1900) 175 Mass. 71, 51 L.R.A. 433, 55 N. E. 812, it was held that the power of the assistant recorder to register titles, given by the Massachusetts act of 1898 (and 1899), under which he makes the registration "in accordance with the rules and instructions of the court," is not a judicial power conferred upon a nonjudicial officer, but is merely ministerial, and the registration is the act of the court.

to all cases at law without regard to the amount in controversy," does not apply to a proceeding to register a land title.<sup>42</sup>

But a constitutional provision that there shall be a right to a trial by jury "in all controversies concerning property" requires that there be a right to a jury trial in registration proceedings.<sup>43</sup>

It has, however, been held in the same state that the Torrens act does not infringe the right of trial by jury where it provides that a party who is aggrieved by a finding of fact in the land court can have a jury trial on appeal to the superior court, although it provides that no matters shall be tried in the superior court except those specified in the appeal, as this is a reasonable regulation and its natural effect will or may be to facilitate, instead of to impede, the exercise of the right.<sup>44</sup>

It seems to be suggested in a case in New York that the court perhaps had no constitutional right to try without a jury an issue of fact in a registration case, the result of which might be to divest the state of its title, but the court does not refer to the provision in the act that "an issue of fact may be tried by a jury, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution and Code of Civil Procedure," nor does it refer to the closing paragraph of the constitutional provision, the entire provision being: "The trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate forever; but a jury trial may be waived by the parties in all civil cases in the manner to be prescribed by law."<sup>45</sup>

h. Objection that defendant is unable to obtain affirmative relief.

A Torrens act is not subject to the objection that it is not in accord with due process of law because a defendant cannot obtain affirmative relief, whatever showing he may make, as the legislature may limit affirmative relief to the person who brings the proceeding.<sup>46</sup>

So, the provision in the statute that the applicant, at any time before the entry of a final decree, might dismiss the application on such terms as shall be fixed by the court, does not, as precluding an adjudication of the defendant's rights, violate the constitutional provision that "every person is entitled to a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property, or character; he ought to obtain justice freely and without purchase, completely and without denial, promptly and without delay, conformably to the laws."<sup>47</sup>

i. Objections on account of assurance fund.

The question of the validity of the act in respect to the assurance fund was considered in State ex rel. Monnett v. Guilbert,<sup>48</sup> where the court stated that the act showed "that the fund is to be raised to indemnify those whose lands had been wrongfully wrested from them, under the earlier provisions of the act, and without due process of law;" and Brooks* (1910) 205 Mass. 458, 92 N. E. 45); but the constitutional provision in that state is that there shall be a right to a jury trial 'in all controversies concerning property' (Mass. Const. 1780, pt. 1, art. 15), which is very different from the provision of our Constitution." It was also held in the same case that a general statute providing for trials by jury in actions for the recovery of specific real or personal property does not relate to proceedings under the Torrens law.

<sup>43</sup> Weeks v. Brooks (Mass.) supra, where the court referred to the statute of 1904, providing that a party who is aggrieved by a finding of fact can have a jury trial on appeal to the superior court, and said: "A jury trial, however, where the title to real property is put in issue, is not a privilege to be granted in the sound discretion of the court, as in probate appeals, or issues in suits in equity, but, is a right guaranteed by the Constitution. In the lawful exercise of this right the respondents were not required to offer any evidence in the court below, but could reserve their testimony for presentation at the trial of the appeal, or even there might take the verdict of the jury upon the case as made out by the petitioner."

stated that this scheme was both inadequate and forbidden under the Ohio Constitution.<sup>49</sup> The court also stated that the scheme was invalid as not providing for the compensation in advance, and as not providing for an assured compensation at any time. It also considered invalid the provision for compulsory registration by assignees, or trustees for the benefit of creditors, and commissioners of insolvent debtors, as lands thus belonging to creditors would be subject to a forced contribution to the assurance fund.<sup>50</sup>

j. Objection that act creates offices illegally.

An act making the county clerk registrar of titles under it does not transgress the provisions of the Constitution in creating a new county office which was neither filled by election nor appointment, for while the county clerk's office was created by the Constitution, its duties were to be prescribed and enjoined by the legislature.<sup>51</sup>

An act is not unconstitutional on the ground that the office of examiner created by it is a county office, which, under the Constitution, must be filled by popular election, as such examiners are not county officers within the meaning of the constitutional provision.<sup>52</sup>

k. Partial invalidity.

A statute providing for the registration of land titles after they are established in a court of equity may be upheld as against all upon whom service of process has been properly made, even if it contains a void provision permitting judgment against a resident of the state, notified only by publication.<sup>53</sup>

A statute making a judicial determination of title to land forever binding and conclusive upon all persons after the lapse of two years may be given effect against parties to the proceeding and persons who must bring legal proceedings to establish their rights, although it would be void in favor of persons in possession of all they claim who were not parties to the proceeding.<sup>54</sup>

Amendment increasing land after publication.

It would seem to be fundamental that there can be no amendment increasing, after publication and notice, the amount of land sought to be registered.<sup>55</sup> But in Illinois such an increase has been considered as no error, or no material error, when all parties interested were "before the court" by service or appearance.<sup>56</sup> The decision, so far as reported, is not commendable.

<sup>49</sup> The court said: "Section 19 of the Bill of Rights ordains: 'Private property shall ever be held inviolate, but subservient to the public welfare. When taken in time of war or other public exigency, imperatively requiring its immediate seizure, or for the purpose of making or repairing roads which shall be open to the public without charge, a compensation shall be made to the owner in money; and in all other cases, where private property shall be taken for a public use, a compensation therefor shall first be made in money, or first secured by a deposit of money.'" <sup>55</sup> In Escueta v. Director of Lands (1910) 16 Philippine, 482, after the decree of registration, the applicant applied to the court L.R.A. 1916D.

to have the same corrected, he having evidence that his boundaries as theretofore stated were not correct, and that the amount of land was larger than he had originally stated, and it was held that the new application could only be granted on a new publication and new notifications.

<sup>56</sup> Tower v. Glos (1912) 256 Ill. 121, 99 N. E. 876, where, after publication of a notice which followed the description in the petition, describing the premises as lots of certain numbers "except that part of said lots conveyed to" a certain railway company, and, subsequently to the filing of the answer, leave was granted the applicant to amend the application by striking out the words "except that part of said lots conveyed to" such railway company. It was held there was no error in registering the title of the applicant to the lots, all the parties who had or claimed to have any interest in the lots being personally served or having appeared, and the decree sustained the finding that no one other than the parties named in the application had any interest in the land. The court admitted that it was essential that the applicant establish title in himself, good as against the world, and that any defendant may insist that the proofs of title are insufficient to permit registration, but did not think there was any defect in his title by reason of the fact that there was no republication after the amendment was

Providing rules of evidence.

The legislature does not exceed the power to provide impartial and uniform rules of evidence by the provision that "the examiner may receive in evidence any abstract of title or certified copy thereof, made in the ordinary course of business by makers of abstracts; but the same shall not be held as more than prima facie evidence of title, and any part or parts thereof may be controverted by other competent proofs."<sup>7</sup>

Delegation of legislative power to people of counties.

A provision that a Torrens act should take effect only in counties where it is so voted is not illegal as an attempt to delegate legislative power.<sup>8</sup>

English language.

Abbreviations in an abstract of title do not render it inadmissible because of a constitutional provision that judicial proceedings shall be conducted, preserved, etc., in no other than the English language, as this provision relates only to the record history of a case, and the abbreviations are open to explanation.<sup>9</sup>

Other questions.

It cannot be objected that a Torrens act fails in the constitutional requirement of due process of law, on the theory that the plaintiff's case is partially tried and disposed of by the court before persons adversely interested are brought into court, on account of the requirement that there be a preliminary report of an examiner before the summons is issued, where the act expressly declares that the court shall not be bound by the report of the examiners of title, but is only to proceed upon satisfactory proof.<sup>10</sup>

A landlord is not deprived of his property without due process of law by a statute which provides that after the title has been judicially determined and registered, the tenure of the owner, the right of transfer and encumbrance, and all rights subsequently accruing, shall be determined in accordance with the rules prescribed by that statute, as this is within the power of the legislature.<sup>11</sup>

So, the failure to provide for any notice of transfers or other dealings subsequent to a registration of title does not make the act invalid as depriving persons of their property without due process of law, as the legislature has power to fix conditions on which land that has made, and said: "The amendment after publishing notice as to 'all whom it may concern' could not have affected the rights of the parties interested in or claiming title to the lots, all of whom were before the court by service of summons or entry of appearance, and, under the facts of this case, allowing the amendment could have no possible effect upon the validity of appellee's title or the rights of any of the parties having or claiming any interest therein. If error at all it was, therefore, harmless error."

In Brooke v. Glos (1910) 243 Ill. 392, 134 Am. St. Rep. 374, 90 N. E. 751, the court said: "We see no constitutional objection to the provision of the statute in so far as it permits a party who seeks to register his title to establish in himself a prima facie title by an abstract of title which was made by a regular abstract maker, and upon which abstract, perhaps, he relied at the time he purchased the property, reserving, however, to persons opposing the registration of his title, the right to establish by proof, if they can, that the abstract is not correct, or, as a matter of fact, the applicant is not the holder of the title to the premises which he seeks to register."

<sup>9</sup> Loehde v. Glos (1914) 265 Ill. 401, 106 N. E. 940, holding that an abstract containing in part letters, abbreviations, and symbols is not inadmissible as evidence of title by reason of the provision [§ 18] of the Illinois Constitution that "all laws of the state of Illinois, and all official writings, and the executive, legislative and judicial proceedings, shall be conducted, preserved and published in no other than the English language," as it is the record history of a cause which alone is preserved, and the constitutional provision that it shall be preserved in no other than the English language refers only to such record. The court stated that the letters, abbreviations, or symbols might have been explained so that their meaning would be clear to the examiner and the court, and the objection being that the abstract contained matter in the shape of isolated letters, figures, and words standing alone which made the document unintelligible "except in certain parts thereof," those portions which are not intelligible ought to have been pointed out, so that the objection might have been obviated by testimony, and that there was no error in disregarding the objection as made. The same was held in Teninga v. Glos (1914) 266 Ill. 121, 107 N. E. 126.

It is not a violation of the provisions as to due process of law in the Constitutions of the United States and of the state of Illinois that where an examiner had died before the filing of the evidence taken before him, such evidence, reduced by him to writing and certified to by him, was, by order of the court, filed in the court, and the cause was heard on that evidence and any other evidence which any party desired to offer.<sup>13</sup>

The property of persons owning land is not confiscated without due process of law by the Philippine statute providing for a six months' statute of limitations, within which claims must be presented to the court of land registration, where property is taken by the government for naval purposes.<sup>14</sup>

One beginning the proceeding cannot claim that the act is unconstitutional.<sup>15</sup>

The constitutionality of the provision adopted in Illinois in 1907, making registration by executors, etc., compulsory, seems not to have been passed upon.<sup>16</sup>

It may be noted that the Washington court in a recent case declined to pass on the constitutionality of the Torrens act of that state as not involved in the decision of the case.<sup>17</sup> adoption by the people of the county, one being as to compulsory registration by executors, etc., the other as to admitting in evidence abstracts made under certain conditions. It was held that these amendments were not properly submitted to the people at the election of 1904. Harvey v. Cook County (1906) 221 Ill. 76, 77 N. E. 424. (The amendment as to abstracts was enacted into law in 1907.) The other amendment was adopted in Cook county in 1910 and provided: "It shall be the duty of all executors and administrators, appointed after the adoption of this act and trustees holding title or power of sale under wills admitted to probate after that date to apply within six months after their appointment, to have registered the titles to all nonregistered estates and interests in land, situated in any county in which this act at the time is in force, which the several decedents they represent might have registered in their lifetime in their own right. Such application shall set forth the names and addresses of the persons entitled to the estate or interest sought to be registered, and any such person not joining in the application shall be made a defendant. The court, in its final decree, in addition to what is provided in the subsequent sections of this act, shall determine the several titles and interests of the persons claiming under the decedent, and declare the same, and decree in whom registration shall be made. Land so registered shall be subject to be sold for the debts of the estate of the decedent, as now provided by law. Provided that the court of probate jurisdiction of the county in which the land is situated, in cases where registration may appear to be a hardship, may, by an order entered of record, excuse such application for registration as to the whole or any part of the land." It has been stated (Niblack, Torrens System, § 180) that the probate court of Cook county grants all applications to be excused from registration, on the ground that the constitutionality of the act should be established before anyone should be compelled to register his title.

III. Construction and effect of American statutes.

a. In general.

The reader will understand that this note does not assume to state the provisions and effect of the acts except as developed in the cases.

It has been held that a Torrens act was not in derogation of common rights, but was a remedial statute, to be liberally construed according to its intent.<sup>18</sup>

It has been said in New York that "it is well settled that the purpose of the act is to register good titles, not to cure bad ones."<sup>19</sup>

b. Who may register; what may be registered.

1. Generally.

Executors and administrators.

It has been held in the Philippines that an executor may not register the title to the lands of his testator in a case where the will of the decedent does not confer upon the executor, as such, any interest in the land of which he died seised;<sup>20</sup> nor may an administrator register the land of his intestate.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>18</sup> Cape Lookout Co. v. Gold (1914) 167 N. C. 63, 83 S. E. 3, where it was claimed that the act was "in derogation of common rights" and should be strictly construed, to which the court said that it was not in derogation of common rights, but was a remedial statute, to be liberally construed according to its intent (here the court quoted), "so as to advance the remedy and repress the evil."

<sup>21</sup> An administrator may not register the land of his intestate, but if he is found to be the sole heir at law, and entitled to the land, the court may allow an amendment and proceed to register it as if he were the applicant. Soriano v. Talens (1911) 20 Philippine, 257.

The Illinois act, however, contains a compulsory feature as to registration by executors, etc., as to which see supra, subd. II. 1.

<sup>22</sup> The receiver of a corporation has such title in fee simple as entitles him to apply for registration where he was appointed receiver under a bill for the dissolution of the corporation and closing up its business, and by the terms of the decree he was not a mere custodian, but was expressly authorized to cause to be removed clouds upon the title to the property of the corporation, which had title in fee to the lot, and the corporation was ordered to convey to him all its property, and a special commissioner L.R.A.1916D.

Receivers.

A receiver may have such title as admits of registration.<sup>22</sup>

Life estates.

It has been held under the Massachusetts statute that a life estate is not a proper title for registration.<sup>23</sup> And under the Illinois statute that it cannot be registered unless the fee has first been registered, the statute providing that no estate less than a fee simple can be registered unless the fee simple to the same land is first registered.<sup>24</sup>

Fee subject to estates, charges, etc.

The estates, charges, etc., to which the owner's title is subject, are in general to be referred to on the certificate. Thus, it has been held that ancestral land subject to a possible statutory remainder to certain relatives if they survive the holder should be registered, recording also the statutory remainder.<sup>25</sup> So, a fee may be registered subject to a possible claim for a certain period under a general provision permitting registration subject to less estates, etc.<sup>26</sup>

Buildings.

The provision in the statute for the registration of land or buildings or an appointed by the court to make a conveyance conveyed the title to the lot in fee simple to him by deed, as he was thereby invested with the legal title in fee simple. Teninga v. Glos (1914) 266 Ill. 94, 107 N. E. 125. The same was held in Teninga v. Glos (1914) 266 Ill. 121, 107 N. E. 126.

<sup>25</sup> Where a mother inherited property from her son, who had inherited it from her husband, his father, and she applied to register the property, it was held that it should be registered, recording in the registration the right (required by art. 811 of the Civil Code) to be reserved to the husband's brothers should they or either of them survive her, as they were within the third degree, art. 811 providing: "The ascendant who inherits from his descendant property which the latter acquired without a valuable consideration from another ascendant, or from a brother or sister, is under obligation to reserve what he has acquired by operation of law for the relatives who are within the third degree and belong to the line whence the property proceeded." Edroso v. Sablan (1913) 25 Philippine, 295.

interest therein "does not authorize the separate registration of the buildings upon the land."<sup>27</sup>

Boundary of highway.

The land court of Massachusetts has jurisdiction to determine whether the applicant has a good title up to the line of the street as originally laid out, or whether the public has acquired a way by prescription over part of his land.<sup>28</sup>

Owners not of record.

The owner of land is entitled to apply said Mildred M. Finn be confirmed, subject as aforesaid," where F. had died a resident of the state of Michigan, and was the owner of an undivided interest in the land prior to the time that the person applying for registration had acquired title, and had been dead less than the seven years allowed under the Illinois statute for her creditors residing in Illinois to have administration on her estate, and to subject the real estate of which she died seised to the payment of their claims, the court summarizing §§ 9 and 25 of the statute concerning land titles as providing: "That it shall be no objection to bringing land under that act that the estate or interest of the applicant is subject to any outstanding lesser estate, mortgage, lien or charge; that every such lesser estate, mortgage, lien or charge shall be noted upon the certificate of title, and the title or interest certified shall be subject only to such lesser estates, mortgages, liens and charges as are so noted, and that the court may, in any proceeding under the act, order the registrar of titles to register such title or interest, and in case the same is subject to any liens, encumbrance, trust or interest, with directions as to the manner and order in which the same shall appear upon the certificate of title to be issued by the registrar."

In Merchant v. Manila (1908) 11 Philippine, 116, it was held that although land which was encumbered might be registered, that where there was a difference in ownership between the land and the building, such property could not be registered. And it was also held, however, that the court of land registration could determine and end the controversy between the owner of the land and the owner of the building under § 2 of the Philippine act (No. 496), which provided that such court shall have "power to hear and determine all questions arising from such applications, and also have jurisdiction over such other questions as may come before it under this act." But the determination of this question should be raised by proper petitions, and if the petitioner applying for registration did not, within a reasonable time, make such petition in the same proceeding, that his petition for the registration of the land should be dismissed.

to have it registered whether he be the owner of record or not. It is not confined to owners of record.<sup>29</sup> Thus, a title based on adverse possession may be registered.<sup>30</sup> But some of the acts have conditions precedent to be fulfilled in case of tax titles.<sup>31</sup>

Possession; occupancy.

Where the statute requires that the plaintiff be in possession of the land as a condition precedent to registering the title, and it appears from the com-

A title may be registered which has been acquired under § 6 of the limitation law providing that "every person in the actual possession of lands or tenements under claim and color of title, made in good faith, and who shall, for seven successive years, continue in such possession, and shall also, during said time, pay all taxes legally assessed on such lands or tenements, shall be held and adjudged to be the legal owner of said lands or tenements, to the extent and according to the purport of his or her paper title." Tobias v. Kaspzyk (1910) 247 Ill. 80, 93 N. E. 52; Peters v. Dicus (1912) 254 Ill. 379, 98 N. E. 560; Glos v. Mickow (1904) 211 Ill. 117, 71 N. E. 830.

A record title not entirely good, which was reinforced by adverse possession, will support registration. Keith v. Kennard, supra.

<sup>31</sup> The provision in the statute that no land the title to which is derived through a sale for taxes or local assessments shall be registered until such title has been adjudicated valid by a court of competent jurisdiction is satisfied where the holder of the tax title brought an action to determine adverse claims against the holder of the legal title and others, and the judgment was in effect an adjudication that the tax title was in all respects valid. This was a sufficient compliance with the Torrens provision, as the statute did not contemplate an adjudication of validity against all possible claimants to the property, as, if so, registration proceedings following the judgment would be useless.

plaint and the examiner's certificate that there is occupation under an adverse title, the complaint is demurrable.<sup>32</sup>

The requirements of the statute that the application shall set forth whether the land is occupied or unoccupied, and that the examiner to whom the case is referred shall examine particularly whether the land is occupied, and make report, are mandatory. Consequently the application must fail where there is no proof of the allegation that the land is unoccupied,<sup>33</sup> or insufficient proof.<sup>34</sup>

So, the allegation in the application that the premises are occupied by the person applying is a material allegation that must be proved as alleged; and it is error to enter a decree registering the title as applied for when the applicant fails to make this proof.<sup>35</sup>

It is no answer to a proceeding for registration of title that the applicant has a complete remedy at law in ejectment where the defendant is in possession as his tenant at will.<sup>36</sup>

<sup>32</sup> The New York statute requires that the plaintiff other than the holder of a contract to purchase be in possession of the land as a condition precedent to registering the title; therefore, where it appears from the complaint and the certificate of title that the defendants had built several structures on portions of the land which were actually occupied by several persons who recognized the defendants or other person as their landlord, which persons in no wise recognized the plaintiff, and claimed no interest under him, it was held that it was unnecessary to make the complaint more definite and certain, inasmuch as it clearly showed that the plaintiff did not occupy the land, either directly or indirectly, and that his assertion of possession was denied by the physical fact that there was occupation under an adverse title, and the demurrer of the defendants was sustained, with leave, however, for the plaintiff to plead over under conditions. *Eldert v. And now the vendor of real property under pacto de retro may apply for registration thereof, provided, of course, that he record the purchaser's right thereto.<sup>39</sup>

Paragraph 6 of § 54 of act 926, quoted in the foregoing note, does not require that the land be cultivated.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>41</sup> Tacloban v. Director of Lands (1911) 18 Philippine, 201, holding that the mere occupation by a municipality for ten years before the passage of act No. 926, known as the public land act, could not serve as a title whereby to acquire the ownership thereof pursuant to the provisions (hereafter quoted) of ¶ 6, § 54, of the act, and therefore on such occupation the land should not be inscribed in the registry as belonging to the municipality. The court stated that to acquire the ownership "it is necessary that the municipality shall have an implied or express grant from the government, without the fulfilment of which requisite it cannot be presumed that a municipality owns and holds in good faith really admittedly belonging to the state, enabling it to convert the same into terreno propio so as to form a part of its estate or municipal assets."

The act provides: "Section 54. The following-described persons or their legal successors in right, occupying public lands in the Philippine Islands, or claiming to own any such lands or interest therein, but whose titles to such lands have not been perfected, may apply to the court of land registration of the Philippine Islands for confirmation of their claims and the issuance of a certificate of title therefor,

... b. All persons who by themselves or their predecessors in interest have been in the open, continuous, exclusive, and notorious possession and occupation of agricultural public lands, as defined by said act of Congress of July first, nineteen hundred and two, under a bona fide claim of ownership except as against the government, for a period of ten years next preceding the taking effect of this act, except when prevented by war or force majeure, shall be conclusively presumed to have performed all the conditions essential to a U.R.A.1916D.

It is no defect in cases of the foregoing character to fail to summon the director of lands when the attorney general is already in court, representing the government.<sup>44</sup>

A person entitled to proceed under ¶ 6 of § 54 of the public land act need not make the payment to the government required by § 65 of that act, although he might have been able to proceed under § 65.<sup>45</sup>

The exemption of the province of Benguet from the public land act does not prevent registration of land in that province under the Torrens act of 1902.<sup>46</sup>

<sup>45</sup> It is provided in § 65 of the public land act that wherever, in any proceedings under the same chapter (6), to secure registration of an incomplete or imperfect claim of title initiated prior to the transfer of the Islands to the United States, it shall appear that had such claims been prosecuted to completion under the laws prevailing when instituted, and, under the conditions of the grant then contemplated, the conveyance of such land to the applicant would not have been gratuitous, but would have involved the payment therefor to the government, that the court should determine the amount the applicant should pay for registration of the land. It was held in Towle v. Director of Lands (1913) 25 Philippine, 637, that although an applicant for land might have been in a position to proceed under § 65 of the act, if, as a matter of fact, he did proceed under, and his evidence shows that he was entitled to registration under § 54, subd. 6, he had a right to proceed under this second statute, and in such case he would not be required to make the payment to the government required under § 65.

the time of the treaty of peace with Spain is entitled to have it registered, although it lies within the limits of what has been declared by the President a military reservation of the United States.<sup>47</sup>

Thus, private property at the time of the treaty with Spain, which was afterwards leased by the owners to the military authorities, does not become public property because it is within a zone reserved by the President of the United States for military purposes, although it may be subject to the public easements and require permission to be obtained as to buildings, etc., but it is entitled to be registered.<sup>48</sup>

—religious lands.

Where land had by decree been registered in favor of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Nueva Segovia "in trust for the use, purpose, behoof and sole benefit of the Roman Catholic Church in these Islands," it was held that the words quoted must be stricken out of the certificate, as, under the law, the registration in the name of the Bishop would, by § 157 of the corporation law, put the title in the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church, and that registration, therefore, in the name of the Bishop or in the name of the Church, was the proper way, and not in the name of the Bishop in trust for the Church.<sup>49</sup>

A parish priest of the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church, administrator of the capellania of a convent, is a sufficient petitioner for the registration of the land of the capellania, notwithstanding that the capellania has no board of directors.<sup>50</sup>

The court said further: "We should be loath to narrow the general and beneficent effect of the land registration act by an interpretation so narrow as to shut out from its bene-

2. More than one piece.

Several pieces of land may be included in one application if they have the same chain of title and belong to the same person, although they are not contiguous, where the act provides that "any number of contiguous pieces of land in the same county, and owned by the same person, and in the same right, or any number of pieces of property in the same county having the same chain of title and belonging to the same person, may be included in one application."<sup>1</sup>

"Contiguous," under such an act providing for the inclusion in one application of "contiguous" properties, means "touching."<sup>2</sup>

The provision permitting lots to be included in one application that have the same chain of title means an identical chain; it does not mean the same chain part of the time.<sup>3</sup>

The expression in such an act, "substantially the same chain of title," means "in the main" the same chain of title.<sup>3</sup>

Where, after a decree was entered registering all the premises but one lot, the applicant filed an amended application as to such lot, making two persons parties not parties to the original proceeding, these persons cannot object that this lot is not contiguous to the other lots, nor that it has not substantially the same chain of title.<sup>4</sup>

3. Easements.

Certificate of servient tenement.

Some of the statutes particularly provide that the certificate shall set forth easements to which the land is subject.<sup>5</sup>

Under such a statute, land of the peti-fits most, if not all, of the corporations existing in these Islands at the time of the transfer of sovereignty, as well as other interests, governmental and otherwise, corporate in form, but not possessing boards of directors which would enable them to comply with the demands of this section."

tioner subject to an easement in favor of a respondent should be so registered.<sup>6</sup>

Certificates of dominant tenement.

But an easement in favor of the applicant's land is not to be entered (but only the easements against it) under a statute providing that the decree "shall set forth the estate of the owner, and also, in such manner as to show their relative priority, all particular estates, mortgages, easements, liens, attachments, and other encumbrances, including rights of husband or wife, if any, to which the land or owner's estate is subject," etc.<sup>7</sup>

But the petitioner is entitled to register his land and a right of way appurtenant thereto where the statute provides that "application for registration of title may be made by . . . the person or persons who claim . . . to own the legal estate or easements or rights in land held and possessed in fee simple."<sup>8</sup>

Owners of easements as defendants to proceeding.

Where an abutter as such is not a necessary party, although the examiner is required to name him, nevertheless all persons having an interest in the property by way of easement or otherwise are necessary parties.<sup>9</sup>

It has been held in the New York second department that an abutter who is the owner of an admitted easement will not be allowed to appear and answer for the purpose of raising issues in which he is not interested, but if he is excluded the certificate should contain a recital that it is without prejudice to his rights, if any;<sup>10</sup> but a later case in the first

In Bigelow Carpet Co. v. Wiggin (1911) 209 Mass. 542, 95 N. E. 938, the jury found that the respondents had rights of way over the land sought to be registered by the petitioner, and this finding the court declined to disturb; but the exceptions were sustained on account of an error in practice.

In Battelle v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1912) 211 Mass. 442, 97 N. In Hawes v. United States Trust Co. L.R.A.1916D.

(1911) 142 App. Div. 789, 127 N. Y. Supp. 632, where the boundary line between the plaintiff's property and that of an adjoining owner ran through a retaining wall, and such adjoining owner, to the extent that said retaining wall stood on the plaintiff's premises, claimed an interest or easement therein, it was held that such adjoining owner was a necessary party and he had a right to appear, and his motion for leave to appear should not be denied on the ground that the time for him to answer or demur had expired, when he was not made a party by the plaintiff. The court distinguished Smith v. Martin (1910) 142 App. Div. 60, 126 N. Y. Supp. 877, infra, as there the application was made for the purpose of raising issues in which the abutter was not interested.

Where, pending an appeal from an order refusing to permit an abutter claiming an easement to appear, the plaintiff, without notice to such appellant, enters judgment that his title be registered, and obtains a certificate of title, it is proper, upon the reversal of such order, that there be entered upon the certificate of title a memorandum referring to the reversing order, and the provisions of the statute relating to the entry upon certificates of memorials and as to leases, liens, mortgages, deeds, or other instruments of transfer, or other voluntary instrument presented for registration, had no relation to an annotation upon a certificate of an order reversing an order denying leave to appear to a person who claimed an easement. Hawes v. Clarke (1913) 159 App. Div. 65, 144 N. Y. Supp. 11, where the court observed that the proposed defendant might have proceeded by moving to vacate the judgment, but that it was not necessary for him to do so.

department seems to hold that an abutter has an absolute right to appear.<sup>11</sup>

c. Notice, and inquiry on which to base it.

The statutory provisions of the law as to the publication of the summons is all that is required in that respect; it is not necessary to follow also the provisions of the general law as to the ordinary service by publication.<sup>12</sup> Where the notice is to be published "at the time of issuing" the summons, once a week for four issues, it is sufficient if its first publication is made in a paper dated one week from the issue of the summons where the paper dated the day of such issue was printed the day before.<sup>13</sup>

A summons will be set aside and the proceedings dismissed where the only means or method of calling attention or giving notice to the heirs or next of kin of a deceased or missing holder of title is the omnibus clause in the summons and complaint, "All other persons, if any, having any right or interest in or lien upon the property affected by this action, or any part thereof," as such rights ought not thus to be taken away and the title registered against them merely by considering these unknown heirs as brought in and made parties by the general words.<sup>14</sup>

The court will not sign the order for the service of the summons at the commencement of the action unless it is satisfied that sufficient facts are shown to call for or justify that order,<sup>15</sup> and where owners are shown to be unknown, there must appear to have been a diligent search.<sup>16</sup> offers an answer which does not contain a defense based upon such ownership nor ask for any affirmative relief, ought not to be allowed to be made a party, nor to appear for the purpose of serving such answer, although he might be allowed to appear simply to protect his interest and to see that the judgment agreed with the complaint, but not to serve his answer, which could only make a delay; and the order excluding him was affirmed, upon the condition, however, that the certificate of registration which might be issued should contain a recital that it was without prejudice to the rights, if any, of the person so excluded. The court said that the judgment could not estop him, as he was excluded from the record upon the plaintiff's motion.

The court said: "The power to register a title which may be conclusive against absent heirs or others having interests in the property should not be L.R.A.1916D.

permitted to do away with the usual precautions to give notice to such heirs. Here the name of White was not in the summons. Had it so appeared, it might reach the attention of some of the family. With that essential wholly left out, and no other notice than the general designation of 'all other persons,' we cannot say that the title of such absentees has been transferred over to the plaintiff by this proceeding by publication. *Barkenthien v. The decision was on the further ground that there was also a lack of evidence to sustain the finding of adverse possession, "should," said the court, "that be decreed a finding of fact."

This case was followed under somewhat similar facts in Sherman v. Carman (1915) 169 App. Div. 17, 164 N. Y. Supp. 494, where judgment of registration was reversed and the complaint dismissed on the ground that the name of a missing owner did not appear in the summons, that his heirs were not named in the summons, and that the evidence of adverse possession was insufficient.

In Partenfelder v. People (1914) 211 N. Y. 355, 105 N. E. 675, infra, subd. d, 1, it was stated that the attempts to find missing remaindermen had been only trivial and wholly inadequate on which to found an order commencing an action against unknown owners, or on which to base a judgment of registration.

It has been held that the court has no jurisdiction to make a decree barring a person where its order directing that the action be commenced, and that service upon him be made by advertisement and mailing, is made when it had not before it any legally satisfactory evidence that diligent or any effort had been made to find such person or his heirs.<sup>17</sup>

For the subject of amendment increasing the amount of land after publication, see supra, subd. II. L.

It is interesting in this connection to refer to Hoffman v. Superior Ct. (1907) 151 Cal. 386, 90 Pac. 939, which arose under the California "McInerney act" of 1906 in regard to cases where the public records had been lost (see the Kerrigan and Zeiss Cases, supra, subd. II. b), where it was held that it was not necessary to make diligent inquiry in order to uphold the constructive service provided for by the act as to unknown interests. It was also held that it was insufficient if the person applying to have his title registered under such act stated in his affidavit that he did not know and had never been informed of any adverse claimants, and that it was not necessary for him to go on and say whether he had made any inquiry or not as to adverse claimants, although the act required that if the applicant was "unable to state," he should show his reasons for such inability, as "the only inquiry necessary to enable him to make the statement required in the statute on this point is a scrutiny of his own mind and memory."

<sup>17</sup> Meighan v. Rohe (1915) 166 App. Div. 175, 151 N. Y. Supp. 785, modified on another ground in (1915) 216 N. Y. 677, 110 N. E. 165, where the statute required that the official examiner's certificate of title "shall state fully what search and efforts have been made to find" actual or possible owners or claimants not known or found, and the certificate simply stated as to a person that he was never heard of after his departure upon his travels, "although diligent efforts have been made to find him," and the only support for this insufficient statement was the applicant's affidavit that she and her father and mother and other members of her family had made every effort to trace such person, but had been unable to locate him or find any trace of him since a date some fifty years before.

In Eldert v. Cross Country R. Co. (1915) 88 Misc. 684, 151 N. Y. Supp. 441, the court sustained a motion to vacate the original order and to set aside the summons, notice of object of action, and all subsequent proceedings, because an inspection of the examiner's certificate disclosed omissions which, in the light of the law as laid down by the court in Partenfelder v. People (N. Y.) supra, showed a lack of jurisdiction to issue the summons therein, where it appeared that a certain person had formerly owned the premises, and there was an entire absence in the certifi-

d. Must have good title.

1. In general.

Evidence establishing title good as against the world is essential to warrant a decree awarding registration of a title;<sup>18</sup> and the petitioner must identify the property.<sup>19</sup>

The petitioner for registration in fee has the burden of proving title in himself, which does not shift, although the weight or preponderance of the evidence cate of any effort to show what search, if any, was made for his heirs, and no deed out of him was shown, and neither he nor his heirs, whether known or unknown, were made parties to the proceeding, and no efforts were shown to locate those heirs. And there were other matters in the examiner's certificate suggesting irregularities and possible outstanding interests which were not covered, and also an adoption of the title as established upon an action in partition without facts from which the regularity of the proceedings in that suit could have been determined. The court said: "As in the Partenfelder Case, the examiner's certificate of title contains the following statement: 'The facts as to the inquiries and efforts made to find any other person having rights or interests in said premises, and the diligence used to ascertain whether or not those known can be served personally with summons, are set forth in the following detailed statement.' But the certificate is silent as to any search whatever. The examiner further says: 'There are no other persons interested or claiming to have any right or interest in said property.' This, of course, is a conclusion wholly unsupported by the facts."

Glos* (1915) 266 Ill. 504, 107 N. E. 897.

Where the applicant for registration does not show that he has a good title to the land, his petition should be denied. Lienau v. Insular Government (1906) 6 Philippine, 230; Inocencio v. Gat-Pandan (1909) 14 Philippine, 491; Oligan v. Mejia (1910) 17 Philippine, 494.

<sup>19</sup> Glos v. Bragdon (1907) 229 Ill. 223, 82 N. E. 224, holding that where the record contains no evidence by which the premises can be located, a decree of registration will be reversed.

"It is a well-settled doctrine of the courts, that a person who seeks to register his title of ownership to certain land in the court of land registration must, like another who brings an action for the recovery of possession, satisfactorily prove, not only his right of ownership, but also may change from one side to the other during the proceedings.<sup>20</sup>

It is not the design of the act that a mere prima facie title shall be registered as a good title.<sup>21</sup>

Thus, a party is not entitled to registration who has not shown the possession of "a good and marketable title, such a one as a court of equity would compel an unwilling vendee to accept,"<sup>22</sup> and the court will not register a questionable title whether it is objected to or not;<sup>23</sup>

In Oligan v. Mejia (1910) 17 Philippine, 494, where the property was shown to be in the defendant, the court, in reversing a judgment of registration and in ordering that the proceeding be dismissed, said: "The applicant for the registration of real property is in the same condition as is a person who prosecutes before the courts an action for the recovery of possession, wherein it is necessary, to secure a favorable judgment, that the claimant prove in an unquestionable manner his ownership and the identity of the property claimed."

In Temple v. Benson (1912) 213 Mass. 128, 100 N. E. 63, the court said: "The petitioner has the burden of proving himself entitled to a registration of the premises as described in the application."

While it is not intended to include in this note foreign cases on this point, it is interesting in this connection to refer to Smith v. Auckland Dist. Land Registrar, 24 New Zealand L. R. 862, where it was held that under the statute the registrar properly refuses to proceed with an application to bring lands under the act where he is not satisfied that the land is vested in the applicant, and that the reviewing powers of the court provided for by the statute ought not to be exercised to order him to proceed with an application involving the right of third parties in their absence, unless it is "clearly satisfied that such a title has been shown as would be forced on an unwilling purchaser."

and where, from the complaint and papers filed therewith, it appears that the plaintiff has not a good title to the premises, the summons should not be issued and the proceedings should be dismissed.<sup>24</sup> simply shows the failure of proof. Maloles v. Director of Lands (1913) 25 Philippine, 548.

<sup>24</sup> Partenfelder v. People (1914) 211 N. Y. 355, 105 N. E. 675, where it appeared that the party applying for registration had a deed from the owner of a life estate, and it did not appear whether the owner of the life estate was living or dead, and the court said under these circumstances there was nothing to show that any statute of adverse possession had run against the remainderman, and further stated that only trivial attempts had been made to discover the whereabouts of the remainderman, which were wholly inadequate on which to found an order commencing an action against unknown owners, or on which to base a judgment of registration.

Where in the premises sought to be registered there were small gores, the title to which appeared according to the official examiner's certificate to be in certain parties not specifically named as defendants to the proceeding, and no facts were stated justifying the omission, it was held that the court had failed to obtain jurisdiction to direct that an action to register such title should be commenced, or to authorize the issue of the summons which was issued (within the rule stated in Partenfelder v. People (1913) 157 App. Div. 462, 142 N. Y. Supp. 915). City & Suburban Homes Co. v. People (1913) 157 App. Div. 459, 142 N. Y. Supp. 924. (Note that the Partenfelder Case was affirmed in the court of appeals, 211 N. Y. 355, 105 N. E. 675.)

In this connection reference may be made to Ventura v. Felix (1913) 26 Philippine, 500, where the owner of lands, having donated them to her grandchildren subject to a life estate in herself, notwithstanding such donation, assumed to sell the lands with the right of repurchase, and later the lands were registered in the names of the grandchildren; thereafter the grandmother executed the agreement of repurchase, paying the money and taking a transfer to herself, and it was held that such transfer would not be registered, as the proper owners of the land were already registered as owners, the assumed sale having passed no title.

It was upon this principle that Meighan v. Rohe (1915) 166 App. Div. 175, 151 the act itself sometimes provides for striking out part of the land.<sup>26</sup>

c. Dismissal or other relief.

Decreeing registration in another than the applicant.

While it has been held in Oregon that the land may be registered in the name of a defendant to the proceeding,<sup>27</sup> and the act sometimes contains a provision giving power to the court to decree in whom the title is vested, whether in the applicant or another person,<sup>28</sup> it is the general rule that the property cannot in whole or in part, be registered as the property of the defendant.<sup>29</sup>

N. Y. Supp. 785, was modified by the court of appeals in (1915) 216 N. Y. 677, 110 N. E. 165. That court, while concurring in the decision of the appellate division that deficiencies in the proceeding existed, as pointed out in the opinion there delivered, which lead to the conclusion that the summons in the action should not have been issued and the judgment registering the plaintiff's title should not have been granted so far as a part of the property was concerned, stated that it was asserted, however, by the plaintiff appellant, that as to another portion of the premises the record disclosed that the plaintiff had a good title, and that the appellate division was in error in dismissing the complaint in the action as to that portion of the property, and the court of appeals sent the case back so as to remit to the special term for rehearing the question of title of the other property.

Where the proof does not agree with the land set out in the petition to its full extent, the judgment of registration will be reversed and the case remanded without prejudice to the right of the petitioner to present an amended petition. Pamintuan v. Insular Government (1907) 8 Philippine, 512.

In Re Lewers & Cooke (1909) 19 Haw. 334, where the court below had denied an application to register land, and the title to part of the land was not controverted, the appellate court held that the decree should be modified by denying the petition without prejudice to the right to obtain a registered title as to the part of the land the title to which was not in controversy. This case was affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States under the title of Lewers & Cooke v. Atcherly (1911) 222 U. S. 285, 56 L. ed. 202, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 94, but this point was not noticed.

Bañuelos* (1911) 20 Philippine, 1, holding that the court may strike out part of the land as to which a good title is not shown, the statute (§ 24 of act No. 496, as amended by act No. 1875, in effect July 1, 1908) providing that "the application may include all the parcels of land or properties belonging to the applicant, provided they are situated within the same province or city. The court may at any time order an application to be amended by striking out one or more parcels or by severance of the application."

This course was followed in Perez y Samanillo v. Gonzalez (1910) 17 Philippine, 343.

However, this seems to have been done as to a part of the land in Flores v. Director of Lands (1910) 17 Philippine, 512 (see infra), but perhaps the case is to be explained as a transfer pendente lite.

As to the question of the constitutionality of the act as denying affirmative relief to defendants, see supra, subd. II. h.

It is error to amend a petition by permitting the respondent's name to be inserted as the person in whose name a portion of the land described in the petition is to be registered, as the land court might not allow such an amendment, by which the respondent became the petitioner, and the petitioner the respondent. If the respondent wished to become a petitioner, he ought to bring his own petition or cross petition. Foss v. Atkins (1909) 201 Mass. 158, 87 N. E. 189 (obiter).

It may be here noted that it was held in Santiago v. Cruz (1911) 19 Philippine, 145, that where it is found that the applicant owns an undivided one half, and the defendants the other undivided one half, the title cannot be registered under the provisions of § 19 of the land registration act, which requires "that one or more tenants claiming undivided shares less than a fee simple in the whole land described in the application shall not make application except jointly with the other tenant owning undivided shares, so that the whole fee shall be represented in the action."

Thus, an opponent cannot by agreement with the petitioner in an action for the registration of land under the Torrens system be substituted for the latter and have the title to the land registered in his name. He must commence an original action for that purpose, and must comply with all the requirements of the law as to publication of notices, etc.<sup>30</sup>

Compare, however, infra, "Transfer pendente lite."

It has been held in the Philippines that a statement in a decree that part of the land belongs to the defendant is not res judicata, and is of no force or effect in an action of ejectment brought by such defendant.<sup>31</sup>

Accordingly, it has been held that it is no objection to a proceeding to register land that there is another proceeding over the same land between the same parties already pending, the defendant in one being the applicant in the other.<sup>32</sup>

But in Minnesota the court seems to take the view that a finding of title in the defendant would operate as an estoppel.<sup>33</sup> The matter there arose in an action to determine adverse claims to real property, which was dismissed on the ground that there was still pending a proceeding theretofore brought by the defendant to register his title, in which the plaintiff in the current action had answered alleging that he was the owner in fee of the land, and praying judgment to that effect. The court, in affirming the judgment of dismissal, pointed out that though in the registration proceedings the defendant might set up his own title, and the court might find that he had a good title, it must then dismiss the proceedings, as he could get no affirmative relief in that action except the form of the judgment, but that nevertheless it was proper to abate his action to determine the adverse claim to real property, while the registration action was still undetermined, as the plaintiff's action was not necessary, and to permit him to carry it out would emasculate the registration act. The court stated that the issues in the two actions were identical; that a judgment registering the applicant's title, if such should be rendered, would unquestionably be conclusive upon the parties in respect to the matters involved in the second action, for the court in the registration proceeding not only has authority to adjudicate the issues, but is required to do so, and said: "The only doubt, therefore, which can be suggested as to the applicability of the rule of abatement as between the proceeding and the action, must inhere in the nature of the judgment or decree which the court must render where applicant fails to establish title, the court having no power in such case to decree title in defendant or to order such title registered, but only to dismiss the application. Gen. Stat. 1913, § 6888."<sup>34</sup> The court said also: "Undoubtedly, under this section, the court may in a proper case dismiss or allow dismissal without prejudice, as in any other action, and must furthermore dismiss where applicant fails to establish title, whether because a defendant has established title in himself, or otherwise; but what court would, after trial on the merits of a defendant's claim of title, fail to make findings according to the facts proved? Indeed, failure to make such findings to a defendant's prejudice would be reversible error. . . . And these, if in defendant's favor, would estop applicant in any subsequent proceeding between the parties involving the same subject-matter."<sup>35</sup>

Lack* (1911) 19 Philippine, 324, where, after a decree had been entered in favor of the applicants, the city of Manila had the decree opened and amended as regarded a certain strip of land, which decree so amended described the strip as the property of the city of Manila, and the city thereafter brought an action of ejectment for the strip, showing no title except the opinion of the judge granting the aforesaid amendment and the proceedings following as a consequence of L.R.A.1916D.

Foreclosure.

Provisions in the act authorizing the court to pass on the validity of liens will not permit the foreclosure of a mechanics' lien in the registration proceedings.<sup>38</sup>

Withdrawal.

The constitutionality of a provision for withdrawal is referred to supra, subd. II. h.

It has been held in Massachusetts that the petitioner's right of withdrawal under the act continued after questions of fact had been decided against him on an appeal from the land court.<sup>39</sup>

It has been held in Washington that it is error for the court, on the petitioner's motion to dismiss, to dismiss the proceeding with prejudice, or with an adverse finding of fact as to part of the real property, when the statute provides that "if, in any case, after hearing, the court finds that the applicant has not title proper for registration, a decree shall be entered dismissing the application, and such decree may be ordered to be without prejudice. The applicant may dismiss his application at any time, before the final decree, upon such terms as may be fixed by the court, and upon motion to dismiss duly made by the court."<sup>40</sup> its registration subject to a mortgage then upon it, and while his application was pending made an arrangement with the mortgagee whereby he sold the premises to the mortgagee with an option of repurchase within a certain period, and after that period had expired the said original mortgagee under the law consolidated its interest and became the absolute owner of the land; it was held that said mortgagee, so having become the absolute owner, had a right to be substituted in the registration proceedings for the applicant, and to have the land registered in its name.

<sup>37</sup> Peters v. Dicus (1912) 254 Ill. 379, 98 N. E. 560, where, after a decree for registration of all the land in the applicant, another person obtained leave to answer, and meantime the original applicant had sold some of the land and filed a supplemental petition for his registration to the unsold land, and his grantee filed a petition for the registration of his title to the land which he had bought, and it was held that these petitions were both properly granted in the same proceeding.

Perhaps the court considered that it was following a similar course in Flores v. Director of Lands (1910) 17 Philippine, 512, where it is stated that "by a transaction" between the applicant and A, part of the land was adjudicated to A, and this part had later been conveyed to B, in whose favor a decree was ordered, all it seems in the same proceeding; but it also appears that the adjudication to A was in view of the acquiescence of the applicant.

is a matter of absolute right, but that the terms are to be fixed by the court, and the court may impose as further terms actionable costs, and may direct the petitioner to pay all the expenses of the defendant. The court said: "It is manifest that the Massachusetts legislature did not intend to follow that in New Zealand, which made the right of withdrawal dependent on the discretion of the judge, nor those in New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania, where the right of withdrawal at any time before the certificate was issued was absolute, and not subject to terms, but did follow that in Victoria and Western Australia, where it is absolute, but subject to terms to be imposed by the court."

It may be noted that the change in this section by chap. 245, of 1910, referred to in Foss v. Atkins (1911) 208 Mass. 510, 94 N. E. 752, provides that a decree dismissing the application "may be ordered to be without prejudice, in whole or in part, but unless it is so ordered it shall bind the parties, their privies, and the land in respect of any issue of fact which has been tried and determined," and that the court in its discretion may require an applicant who moves to withdraw or substitute another to stipulate that he shall be bound by the result of any issue of fact which has been tried and determined, "and such stipulation shall bind the parties, their privies, and the land itself," etc.

<sup>40</sup> Krutz v. Dodge (1911) 66 Wash. 178, 119 Pac. 188, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 869, where the court refers to McQuesten v. Com. (Mass.) supra, and other Massachusetts cases, and says: "But it is said that under the Massachusetts law the title is not determined by a court of general jurisdiction, but by a land board exercising no juridical functions. This may be admitted, but it does not destroy the reasoning upon which the decisions are made to rest; that is, that the procedure is a voluntary one, and its limitations as well as the power of the tribunal administering it, are to be found in the act itself, and not by reference to

f. Matters of evidence peculiar to the acts.

1. In general.

It is not intended in general to include matters of evidence which are not peculiar to proceedings under these acts.

Examiner's preliminary reports.

The opinions of the examiner in his preliminary report prior to bringing the action are not evidence for or against a party on the trial of the issues.<sup>41</sup>

Where the examiner in his certificate expresses a matter to be his opinion, this is not within the statute providing that the allegations and statements of the examiner's certificate of title and of his abstract and searches, etc., shall be prima facie and presumptive evidence of the facts so alleged and stated, where the act further provided that the allegations and statements in the certificate should be taken and construed as statements of fact, "unless they are expressly declared therein to be conclusions or opinions." Consequently, such allegations have no probative force whatever, although they are not controverted by answer expressly, the general rules of law. Nor can we agree with the contention that the provision of the law providing for a dismissal without prejudice implies that it may be with prejudice when a motion for voluntary dismissal is made, nor that the right to impose terms implies a right to fix a condition."

A legal conclusion by the examiner cannot be accepted by the court unless he gives the facts upon which it is based. Lachman v. People (1909) 127 N. Y. Supp. 912 (where the court, in passing upon an application for an order directing that the action be commenced by the issuance of the service of summons, pointed out many defects in the papers, this being the first application under the statute. The court in the same case questions the propriety of the attorney for the applicant being the examiner, or, that is to say, of the person who was the examiner acting also as the attorney for the applicant).

So, in Voorhies v. Voorhies (1910) 66 Misc. 78, 120 N. Y. Supp. 677, it was held obiter (prior to the amendment in 1910 of § 385 of the act) that while the statements made by the examiner were sufficient to enable the court to issue the summons, they had no effect as evidence of title upon the trial.

<sup>42</sup> Hamlin v. People (1913) 155 App. Div. 680, 140 N. Y. Supp. 643, the statute, § 385, by the amendment of 1910, providing that "in all proceedings subsequent to the determination by the court that the plaintiff appears to have a title that should be registered, the allegations and statements of the examiner's certificate of title and and no demand is made that the plaintiff adduce common-law proofs of the facts upon which he relied.<sup>43</sup>

The same section of the act declares that where a party has controverted in his pleadings specifically an allegation or statement contained in the certificate of title, etc., any party may require at the trial that the ordinary rules of evidence and proof shall apply unaffected by the statute; when this is done the burden of proof is on the plaintiff affirmatively to establish his title notwithstanding the provisions of said section.<sup>43</sup>

Examiner's report made after action is begun.

In Illinois the relation to the court and the parties, of the examiner of titles to whom it is referred to examine and report to the court as to the title, after the action has been commenced, is analogous to that of the master in chancery in other chancery proceedings,<sup>44</sup> and he should so far report the evidence as to show its introduction before him, notwithstanding the statute provides that he shall not be required to report to the court more than the substance of the

of his abstract and searches, and in the survey, shall be prima facie and presumptive evidence of the facts so alleged and stated, and if any defendant controverts any allegation or statement contained in said certificate of title, abstract, or searches, or survey, the facts controverting such allegation or statement must be specifically pleaded and set forth, and, except as in this section otherwise provided, must be established affirmatively by the defendant pleading or setting forth the same. The court may require, at any time, any amendment or modification of said official examiner's certificate, or any further or amended survey or certificate, or any additional evidence or proof that may be necessary or proper. All the allegations and statements in said certificate, abstract, searches, and survey shall be taken and construed as statements of fact, unless they are expressly declared therein to be conclusions or opinions. Where a party has controverted in his pleading specifically an allegation or statement contained in said certificate of title, abstract, searches, or survey, any party who has appeared in person or by attorney or counsel at the trial may require that the ordinary rules of evidence and proof, unaffected by this section, shall apply to the matters so controverted."

proof submitted to him, except upon the request of some party to the proceeding or by the direction of the court;<sup>45</sup> and it is error for the examiner of titles to make his decision upon papers not in evidence, such as abstracts of title; and where he stated in his report that he had been furnished with certain abstracts of title, and these abstracts were not returned by him as part of the evidence, nor were they offered in evidence, nor did they appear in the record, it was held that the report would be set aside.<sup>46</sup>

But the Illinois examiner is not required to return the evidence unless it is asked for.<sup>47</sup>

Miscellaneous.

A statute changing a rule of evidence, but not the substantial rights of the parties, will apply to future trials of a case pending when it took effect.<sup>48</sup>

Other miscellaneous cases are referred to in the notes.<sup>49</sup>

2. Abstracts.

A number of cases have arisen in Illinois as to the admission of abstracts in land registration proceedings, first under the burnt records act and later under the amendment of 1907.

It was held that it was error for the examiner to whom the matter had been referred after the action for registration of title had been begun, to receive in evidence abstracts of the record of conveyances without requiring preliminary proof that the original conveyances were lost or destroyed by fire, etc., with the other preliminary proof required by the burnt records act.<sup>50</sup>

<sup>47</sup> Where the defendant, instead of asking for an order upon the examiner to return the evidence, moved that the solicitor for the applicant should return the examiner's report and the exhibits in his possession, and the court ordered that the solicitor should return the report, but might retain the exhibits, and permitted him by further order to withdraw the exhibits filed with the examiner, but to hold the same subject to the order of the court, it was held that the defendant could not complain as he had not proceeded to take an order on the examiner. Mundt v. Glos (1910) 246 Ill. 636, 93 N. E. 49.

absence of the evidence, see Van Ness v. Boinay (1913) 214 Mass. 340, 101 N. E. 979.

<sup>49</sup> In Glos v. Hoban (1904) 212 Ill. 222, 72 N. E. 1, it was held that where the applicant shows a good title, it is not necessary for him to show the invalidity of an opposing tax deed; that in such case the onus lies upon the holder of the alleged tax title to show its validity. Approved in Glos v. Talcott (1904) 213 Ill. 81, 72 N. E. 707, which, however, was reversed on other grounds. The same was held in McMahon v. Rowley (1908) 238 Ill. 31, 87 N. E. 66, the court stating that the same rule was upheld under the burnt records act in Gage v. Caraher (1888) 125 Ill. 447, 17 N. E. 777.

The same was held in Messenger v. Messenger (1906) 223 Ill. 282, 79 N. E. 27, the court also holding that the proposed amendment to § 18 of the act, permitting abstracts made under certain conditions to be admitted in evidence, had not been properly submitted to the people of the county, as was required by the terms of the amendment as passed in 1903, follow-

In 1907 there was passed an amendment to § 18 of the act,<sup>1</sup> which provided that "the examiner may receive in evidence any abstract of title or certified copy thereof, made in the ordinary course of business by makers of abstracts; but the same shall not be held as more than prima facie evidence of title, and any part or parts thereof may be controverted by other competent proofs."

For cases upon the constitutionality of this amendment, see supra, subds. II. d, and II. l. This amendment did not require submission to the people of the county and became operative without, although the original (Torrens) act required submission to the people of the county.<sup>2</sup>

To authorize the admission of an abstract in evidence under this statute, there must be competent evidence that it was made in the ordinary course of business by a maker of abstracts.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> It is not sufficient to enable an abstract to be introduced in evidence under this statute, that the applicant testified that such abstracts were ordered in the regular course of business from a certain corporation engaged in the business making of abstracts for hire in Cook county, giving the name of the corporation (Culver v. Waters (1910) 248 Ill. 163, 93 N. E. 747); nor that the testimony was that the abstract was made in the usual course of business where the witness testified merely from an examination of the abstract itself (Waugh v. Glos (1910) 246 Ill. 604, 138 Am. St. Rep. 259, 92 N. E. 974).

It is error to admit an abstract printed except the signature, where there is no evidence as to when or where or under what circumstances the abstract was made, and it shows on its face that it was the result of examinations by various examiners at various times, such examiners not being shown to be makers of abstracts, nor their examination shown to have been made in the ordinary course of business. (Ill.) Ibid.

But it is proper to admit an abstract of a title company signed by the company by its secretary, who testifies that it was made in the usual course of business under his supervision and direction, and duly signed by such company by himself as sec- L.R.A.1916D.

Abstracts signed by the official recorder of the county are properly admitted where a witness testifies that he was an employee in the recorder's office of the county, and that the abstract was made in such office under his supervision and direction in the ordinary course of business, and was signed by the recorder.<sup>4</sup>

A copy of a copy of an abstract, the "last" copy not being certified, is not admissible.<sup>5</sup>

Decisions since the Illinois amendment of 1913.

The Illinois statute was amended in 1913 by adding a provision that certain proof as to abstracts should be sufficient.<sup>6</sup>

A county recorder is not necessarily a maker of abstracts,<sup>7</sup> but on proper evidence abstracts made in his office may be admitted.<sup>8</sup>

retary. Hammond v. Glos (1911) 250 Ill. 32, 95 N. E. 39.

It is sufficient to admit an abstract, that a witness testifies that he is in the office of the abstracter and knows of his own knowledge that the abstract was made in the usual course of business, and that he was in such office at the time that the abstract was made. Caswell v. Glos (1911) 251 Ill. 505, 96 N. E. 251, so holding both as to a corporation abstracter and as to the office of the recorder.

office testifies that the recorder was in the business of making abstracts for the general public. Amundson v. Glos (1915) 271 Ill. 209, 110 N. E. 914.

It was held that an abstract made by the recorder of the county was properly admitted in evidence where a witness testified that he was an abstract maker and had been employed by the recorder of that county as an abstract maker for eleven years, and was in such employ at the date of the certificate of the abstract, which stated the name of the recorder; that the signature was in the handwriting of the deputy recorder; that the abstract was made on an order given, "the order being 60,485, and was made in the regular course of business by the abstracter of Cook county, acting recorder," the court concluding from this testimony that it was reasonably to be inferred that the recorder of Cook county was engaged in making abstracts for hire. Bonner v. Glos (1915) 270 Ill. 567, 110 N. E. 916.

Where objection was made to the admission in evidence of an abstract made by the recorder of deeds of Cook county, on the ground that there was no evidence to show that such recorder was the maker of abstracts of title, or engaged in the business of making abstracts of title, the court pointed out that under the provisions of chapter 115 of Hurd's Statutes of 1913, the county recorder, in counties where a recorder is elected, is to keep abstract books when required by the county board, and in such event is required to furnish abstracts of title. The court stated that, strictly speaking, the better practice would be to prove that the county board required the recorder to keep abstract books and make abstracts, as such proof would show that the recorder was the maker of abstracts, but held that the abstract was admissible anyway where the proof was that it was certified by the person who was the recorder of deeds, and was made by a maker of abstracts engaged in that business, and it further appeared from the evidence that the making of the abstract and other abstracts was part of the duties of the office of the recorder, and that one of the departments of his office was engaged in that business, and the abstract was made and issued in the ordinary course of business, and that he was engaged in making abstracts for hire. Walther v. Glos (1915) 270 Ill. 390, 110 N. E. 509.

<sup>9</sup> In Harts v. Glos (1915) — Ill. —, 111 N. E. 125, it was held that abstracts were improperly admitted where there was no proof that the signature of the person purporting to make or issue the abstracts was L.R.A.1916D.

his genuine signature, nor anything to show that such maker was known or generally reputed to have been in the business of making abstracts of title for hire at the date shown upon the abstract or at the actual date of the issuance thereof, nor sufficient evidence that the signature was appended in person or by the hand of any person or official accustomed to attach such signature in the ordinary course of business.

But an undated certificate that a copy of an abstract is a true copy signed in the firm name of the firm that made the abstract, in the handwriting of a partner, is prima facie evidence for the admission in evidence of the copy, as it is not presumed that a partner would sign at the time when he was not a partner. Loehde v. Glos (1914) 265 Ill. 401, 106 N. E. 940; Teninga v. Glos (1914) 266 Ill. 94, 107 N. E. 125.

A copy of an abstract certified by a member of the firm, who made it in the firm's signature, will be admitted in evidence when it is shown that the abstract was made in the ordinary course of business by that firm, which at that time was engaged in the business of making abstracts for hire, although the same witness testified on cross-examination that the abstract might have been certified to when the makers had before them only a copy which they had previously certified to, instead of the original, as such evidence is not sufficient to impeach the certificate of the makers that the copy was made from an original abstract. Walther v. Glos (Ill.) supra.

The copy of an abstract is evidence where it contains a certificate that it is a true copy of the original signed by a person who had an interest in the firm, and who was accustomed to attach the firm signature, in the ordinary course of business, together with the testimony of a witness that he was acquainted with the firm and had worked for them; that they were in the business of making abstracts for hire, and were in that business when the abstract was made, and made the abstract as a part of the transactions ordered in their office at the time it bore date; that he knew the firm signature, and that the signature was the genuine signature of said abstracters, and was written by the aforesaid person, who had an interest in the firm. Wilson v. Glos (1914) 266 Ill. 392, 107 N. E. 630.

It has been held in the New York second department that an abutting owner who has no interest in the subject-matter of the action cannot raise the constitutionality of the registration statute,<sup>12</sup> nor the question that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action generally;<sup>13</sup> but if made a party, he may demur on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him.<sup>14</sup>

It has, however, been held in the New York first department, that an abutting owner has an absolute right to appear where the statute provides that an abutting owner may file a caution requiring written notice to be given to him of any application for the registration of any or all of the land abutting on his land, and that all persons who have filed any caution shall be named as defendants, for the statute thus recognizes abutters as persons "whose interests may be affected by the judgment in the action," who are given an absolute right to appear and answer.<sup>15</sup>

A defendant cannot complain of a decree allowing the petitioner to register title to property in which such defendant claims no interest,<sup>16</sup> but a defendant claiming a right to or lien upon part of the property, who appears by an order of court declaring such defendant a proper party, has a right to defend on the ground that the complaint and the papers connected therewith did not show that the plaintiff was entitled to be registered.<sup>17</sup>

Where no question is raised as to the validity of the plaintiff's title, a person who is served or who has notice cannot object that the proceedings are defective or insufficient as to nonresidents or unknown owners.<sup>18</sup>

See as to default by Philippine director of lands, Cabanas v. Director of Lands, infra, subd. III. g. 2.

Where, after the filing of a complaint, the act was amended requiring the complainant to state "what claim, if any, the state of New York makes to the property in question, or what interest, if any, it has therein other than the general governmental interest, or such as exists as to all land in private ownership," the attorney general filed an answer after such amendment of the statute denying that the people have any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any of the allegations in said complaint contained; the court refused to grant a motion for judgment upon such answer, and said, among other things, that the judgment would not be rendered against the people on a question of pleading, and that while it was held that a denial of information, etc., did not raise an issue as to matters that are of public record, it could not properly be said in these proceedings that the attorney general was charged with a knowledge of all records of private titles throughout the state. *Smith v. "In order that an application for registration of the title of ownership in the court of land registration may be objected to, pursuant to the provisions of act No. 496, the opposition must be based on the right of dominion or some other real right opposed to the adjudication or recognition of the ownership of the petitioner, whether it be limited or absolute; and if none such rights of the respondent have been injured by the judgment, he cannot have, on his part, the right to appeal from the said judgment, whatever it may be, as neither the said act nor any other law on this matter grants anyone the right to appeal on behalf of another party, and not in his own name and by reason of his own interest." *Roxas v. nature proper to be registered,—that is, good against all the world,—the application should be dismissed, without regard to the question whether the claim of title of a defendant is a good title or a mere cloud. If, on the other hand, the applicant has shown such a title as may be registered, he may then have the incidental relief of the removal of clouds from such title, and if a decree of registration is entered, which also removes the cloud of a defendant's claim of title, such defendant cannot insist upon the want of service upon another defendant with whom he is in no way connected, as error."

In Tyler v. Judges of Ct. of Registration (see supra, subd. II. b), brought into the Supreme Court of the United States (1900) 179 U. S. 405, 45 L. ed. 252, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206, by writ of error, the plaintiff in error having been the applicant for a writ of prohibition as to the Massachusetts act from which the proceedings arose, the court pointed out that the plaintiff in error could not raise the question as to the unconstitutionality of the act as lacking in notice, where he himself had actual notice of the proceedings, although not a party to them, that is to say, he could not raise the question to the extent that his writ of error would be within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; four of the judges dissented on the ground that the objection of the applicant was not as to the jurisdiction of the court over him personally, but as to its jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

2. Necessity and effect.

In Illinois, where no exceptions or objections are raised to the examiner's report, the proceeding being one in chancery, the parties cannot complain if the report is approved by the court.<sup>21</sup>

Objections to the report of the examiner of titles as to evidence must be made in the court below.<sup>22</sup> Thus, a constitu-

So, where the director of lands was duly served and defaulted, and made no objection to the registration until after the decision, when a motion was made for a new trial, it was held that he could not then object and he could not appeal. Cubanas v. Director of Lands (1908) 10 Philippine, 393.

Where the defendant asked the examiner that the evidence be returned into court, and the examiner, instead of returning documents, returned copies of them, it was held that the defendant, not having applied for relief to the court below, could not raise the question on appeal. Cregar v. Spitzer (1910) 244 Ill. 208, 91 N. E. 418.

Where some evidence was introduced in the form of uncertified records which seem to have been afterwards abandoned as not necessary for the applicant's case, it was claimed by the defendant that the examiner had based his report in part on this evidence and that he had not returned it; it was held that there was no error in sustaining the report of the examiner, as defendant should have objected and raised the question, if he did not think that the evidence had been returned, and asked the trial judge to require the examiner to report the evidence; and that this was required by the statute. McMahon v. Rowley (1908) 238 Ill. 31, 87 N. E. 66.

Where, it being objected that the abstract contained unintelligible hieroglyphics and abbreviations, a witness was tendered to the defendant to explain any abbreviations or hieroglyphics, and the defendant asked him what the abbreviations "b. e. d. h." meant, and he said that they meant "bearing even date herewith," and no further explanation was required by the defendant, the objection was gone. Amundson v. Glos (1915) 271 Ill. 209, 110 N. E. 914, where the witness was an abstract maker in the abstract department of the recorder's office of the county, and the abstract was one from that office.

Where a finding of fact by an examiner was not excepted to, the court on appeal will take it as conclusively establishing the fact. Keeney v. Glos (1913) 258 Ill. 555, 101 N. E. 943, where the question was as to the lack of good faith in one acquiring a tax deed, because he gave no notice as to redemption to the owner, and the examiner found that the property was assessed to a certain person, and it was claimed that it was not assessed to anyone.

tional question not in the record, and not raised below, cannot be raised on appeal.<sup>23</sup>

An objection to a finding of title by the examiner does not raise the question that he admitted an abstract of title without the necessary preliminary proof.<sup>24</sup>

h. Practice in general.

Generally the ordinary rules of pleading apply unless it is otherwise provided.<sup>25</sup>

It is not necessary to plead the statute under which the complaint is brought.<sup>26</sup>

The state is not to be made a party because it has a lien for taxes on the land, where the statute provides that the state shall be joined as a party when,

<sup>25</sup> Where it appears on the face of the petition that no title could have been gained in the manner described in the petition or application, and the point was not raised by pleading, if it appears that the petitioner is entitled to any relief, evidence may be admitted to that end and the matter of amendment left in abeyance, as the proceeding is in the nature of a suit in equity, and the rules of equitable procedure generally apply. Re Title of Pa Peiekane (1912) 21 Haw. 175.

Under the New York act there cannot be a judgment on the pleadings for the applicant when the defendant denies each of the allegations of the complaint, including the plaintiff's ownership, and sets forth the facts upon which his denial of the statements of the certificate, abstract, searches, and survey is based, and further states what his interest is, and sets forth a number of defenses. (If the defenses are inconsistent, the court has the power, on motion, to compel an election.) Sunderman v. People (1912) 3 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. N. S. 6, 138 N. Y. Supp. 500.

See, as to form of answers by the People, Smith v. Martin (1910) 69 Misc. 108, 124 N. Y. Supp. 1064, supra, subd. III. g. 1.

A provision for a consent with an acknowledgment by the husband or wife of an applicant does not make it necessary that the consent of other parties should be acknowledged.<sup>29</sup>

The court in a registration case should make findings of fact and conclusions of law;<sup>30</sup> and the court will reverse a judgment entered upon the report of a referee when the findings of fact made by the referee are not sufficient to sustain the conclusions of law and the direction for judgment.<sup>31</sup>

In Owsley v. Johnson (1905) 95 Minn. 168, 103 N. W. 903, the court, in holding that findings of fact should have been made, but that their omission in the case was not reversible error, said: "We are of opinion that, in proceedings of this kind, though the Torrens act contains no express directions on the subject, where issues are made by the appearance of parties who, by their pleadings, assert rights in the property sought to be registered adverse to the petitioners, findings of fact should be made as in ordinary civil actions. In fact, all rules and principles of law applicable to equitable actions and proceedings, and rules of practice with respect to the trial, introduction of evidence, findings, and order of judgment, should, so far as not clearly inappropriate or otherwise provided for by the act, be followed and applied."

<sup>31</sup> Jamieson & B. Co. v. Reynolds (1915) 169 App. Div. 107, 154 N. Y. Supp. 836, where there was a finding of fact "that the plaintiff and its predecessors in ownership have had record title to the premises sought to be registered herein, since in or about the year 1877, as appears by the documentary evidence herein," to which the court said: "This is not at all a finding of fact, but a conclusion of law expressly inferred from 'the documentary evidence herein;' but as to the facts established by this 'documentary evidence,' there is no finding whatever." The court also said: "Doubtless this court may, under the recent amendments to the Code of Civil Protered on the decision of a referee appointed to hear and determine.<sup>32</sup>

It is error to refuse the successful applicant a writ of possession against percurrence and the precedents applying to them, go outside the findings of the referee and search the record for basis for additional findings to support the judgment. We shall not do so in this case, for we feel that it is most desirable that actions conducted under this statute should be regular and workmanlike in their procedure. This statute appears to come into larger use, year by year. It will furnish a large volume of judicial work. This work should be done adequately in the forum of its origin, and the appellate courts should be freed from the necessity of retrying issues on appeal."

<sup>32</sup> The provision of the act that "no judgment of registration shall be made unless the court is satisfied that the title to be registered accordingly is free from reasonable doubt" does not mean necessarily that the court itself must determine the issues raised by the pleadings, for § 371 of the statute provides that the issues shall be tried by the court or referee. Furthermore, actions of this kind are, by express provision of the statute, subjected and assimilated to actions regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure. Jamieson & B. Co. v. Reynolds (N. Y.) supra, where the case was reversed on other grounds.

<sup>33</sup> Pasay Estate Co. v. Del Rosario (1908) 11 Philippine, 391, where the court below had refused the writ on the ground that such persons were not defeated persons. The appellate court, in sustaining a demurrer to the answer of the judge against whom a mandamus was sought for the writ, quoted § 17 of the land registration act, as amended by § 5 of act 1108, to wit: "Section 17. The court of land registration, in all matters over which it has jurisdiction, may enforce its orders, judgments, or decrees in the same manner as orders, judgments and decrees are enforced in the courts of first instance, including a writ of possession directing the governor or sheriff of any province or of the city of Manila to place the applicant in possession of the property covered by a decree of the court in his favor. . . ."

In Brown v. Hagadorn (1912) 119 Minn. 491, 138 N. W. 941, it was held that the provision requiring that those who acquire interest pending proceedings to register must answer at once does not entitle the party to answer as a matter of right after six months. And while the general provisions in the statute as to answers give the court power to allow further time to answer than that named in the summons, and thus it is within the jurisdiction for the court on the facts to allow or disallow an application to answer after six months by persons who acquired interest pending the proceedings, there is no abuse of discretion in declining to permit such parties to answer six months afterwards, where their claim was inherently weak.

The court of land registration may, before the entry of a decree, open a case for the admission of further evidence and further presentation of an amended petition. Capellania del Convento de Tambobong v. Antonio (1907) 8 Philippine, 683.

In Crabbe v. Hardy (1912) 138 N. Y. Supp. 870, the plaintiff offered proof after having made an application to reopen the case, which was allowed, and it was held that supplemental proof proved a good title, together with that which had been already offered, and his title was registered.

There is nothing in the North Carolina act of 1913, known as the Torrens act, to prevent the clerk from enlarging the time in which answers shall be received, nor from receiving answers after the time has expired, nor to prevent the court from permitting this course, the statute requiring the court to review the whole proceeding, and declaring that it has power to require any reformation in the process, pleadings, decrees, or entries. The statute provided: "Every decree rendered as hereinbefore provided shall bind the land and bar all persons claiming title thereto or interest therein, quiet the title thereto, and shall be forever binding and conclusive upon and against all persons, including the state of North Carolina, whether mentioned by name in the order of publication or included under the general description, 'To whom it may concern.' It shall not be an exception to such conclusiveness that the person is an infant, lunatic, or is under any disability, but such person may have recourse upon the indemnity fund provided for, for any loss he may suffer by reason of being so conclusive. Such decree shall, in addition to being signed by the clerk of the superior court, be approved by the judge of the superior court, who shall review the whole proceeding, and have power to require any reformation of the process, pleadings, decrees, or entries." It was further held that no appeal would lie from the court's action in allowing the answers to be put in, as this was a matter of discretion; and further, that an appeal would not lie, as it was premature, as such order was not a final judgment. Empire Mfg. Co. v. Spruill (1915) 169 N. C. 618, 86 S. E. 522.

as to surveys,<sup>35</sup> and certain miscellaneous matters.<sup>36</sup>

Illinois practice as to outstanding tax deeds, etc.

In Illinois, an applicant for registration under the Torrens act, although he does not in terms ask to have the tax deed held by others set aside, brings himself within the equity rule that he who seeks equity must do equity, within the requirement of a statute that he who seeks to set aside a tax deed must pay the holder all taxes and legal costs and penalties paid by the holder, etc., which is construed as the taxes and legal interest, as the effect of the proceeding is to remove all liens and clouds from the title.<sup>37</sup>

So it is error to register the title without prior reimbursement to the owners of void tax deeds, and therefore a decree permitting registration on condition that such reimbursement be made in a certain time is error.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>35</sup> In Lichauco v. Lim (1906) 6 Philippine, 271, it was held that while the act authorizes the court to require that a new survey be made for the purpose of determining boundaries of land sought to be brought under the provisions of the land registration act, nevertheless the issuance of such order rests in the sound discretion of the court, and it is not mandatory.

But, under the acts of 1908, §§ 4 and 5 of act No. 1875 of the Philippine legislature, the plan to accompany the application must be by a duly authorized surveyor; that is, duly authorized to make surveys for the court of land registration. Aguillon v. Director of Lands (1910) 17 Philippine, 506.

Where, after the decree, a rehearing was granted on petition of another applicant, and part of the land was found to belong to him, the original applicant acquiescing, it was held that a new survey by an authorized surveyor must be had. Flores v. Director of Lands (1910) 17 Philippine, 512.

The New York act requires that a survey be filed. Barkenthien v. People (1914) 212 N. Y. 36, 105 N. E. 808.

<sup>36</sup> In Cregar v. Spitzer (1910) 244 Ill. 209, 91 N. E. 418, it seems to be held that where the application is lost, and not in the transcript, the court will not presume that it did not contain the residence of the applicant, particularly when the examiner reported that the application followed the form prescribed by the statute.

In order to foreclose a mortgage by advertisement it is not necessary that assignments of the mortgage made before the land was registered be entered upon the certificate of title, as such assignments are not within the statute providing that "where the mortgage is upon registered land, it shall be sufficient to authorize the foreclosure thereof by advertisement, if such mortgage and all assignments have been registered, and a memorial thereof duly entered upon the certificate of title." Sander v. Stenger (1912) 117 Minn. 424, 136 N. W. 4.

As to the death of an examiner and reference to a substitute examiner, and also as to re-referring the case to take evidence where the examiner has erroneously sustained an objection to a question put to a witness, see McMahon v. Rowley (1908) 238 Ill. 31, 87 N. E. 66. L.R.A.1916D.

Where it appeared that the holder of a tax deed set aside had made a quitclaim deed to a party of an undivided one-hundredth interest in the premises, and that, after the execution of the deed, such party had made payment of taxes at different dates, amounting in the aggregate to $2.46, her title could not be set aside as a cloud upon the applicant's title without repayment of the taxes which she had paid. Stallings v. Glos (1915) 271 Ill. 201, 110 N. E. 915.

In Jackson v. Glos (1909) 243 Ill. 280, 90 N. E. 717, it was held that a tax deed for a vigintillionth of a lot could not be set aside without reimbursing the owner. The court stated that the applicant might have stood on her legal right and disregarded such tax deed as not a cloud upon the title, but, having appealed to the court to remove it as a cloud upon a title, she was subject to the ordinary statute that reimbursement must be made.

The holder of a tax deed set aside should be reimbursed not only for the amounts paid by her up to the time that she received the tax deed, but for taxes subsequently paid. Strebel v. Glos (1915) 271 Ill. 65, 110 N. E. 778.

And where it is conceded that the amount allowed by the examiner to the owner of a tax deed in setting aside his deed was insufficient, the judgment will be reversed, and the case will be sent back to the circuit court to make the proper corrections. Finn v. Glos (1915) 268 Ill. 350, 109 N. E. 351.

But a general objection of the insufficiency of the amount allowed for taxes and expenses of a holder of tax titles set aside as clouds on the title will be disregarded, as the objector ought to point out the specific errors that he claims, so that the examiner might have an opportunity to correct any mistakes. Walther v. Glos (1915) 270 Ill. 390, 110 N. E. 509.

Where, under the proof of the plaintiff, the holder of a tax deed was barred, it was held that the error, if any, was harmless in setting aside this deed upon payment of the expenditures of the holder in securing it, although there was no proof that the deed was invalid. Glos v. Mickow (1904) 211 Ill. 117, 71 N. E. 830.

But it is proper to decree registration of title without requiring the applicant to reimburse the holder of the certificate of tax sale, where the time for the execution of the deed upon the certificate has expired without any deed being taken.<sup>39</sup> And there is no error in a decree of registration without provision for the reimbursement of the holder of a tax deed who entirely fails to prove the amount he expended for it.<sup>40</sup>

An applicant for official registration cannot have a tax deed removed as a cloud unless he shows he has a good title entitled to registration; so that one claiming to own a tax title is entitled to have the proceedings dismissed if he can show that the applicant has not a good title, or a title of a nature proper to be registered, and need not, if he can do this, go into the question as to whether his tax title is merely a cloud or not.<sup>41</sup>

4. Costs, etc.

In Illinois the court is invested with a discretion in allowing the examiner's and other fees and determining which party shall pay them, and it seems that the matter is treated as an ordinary chancery suit in this respect,<sup>42</sup> but it is improper to render a judgment in favor of the registrar for the fees which the court directs to be paid to him.<sup>43</sup>

Costs incurred in defeating a claim upon an alleged judgment lien are rightfully charged to the claimant;<sup>44</sup> but no part of the cost of a proceeding for registration should be charged upon the defendant, the holder of a tax title, who puts in no evidence, but simply insists that the applicant should show a good title.<sup>45</sup>

Costs against the people.

In a recent case in New York, the court, in reversing a judgment in favor of the applicant on other grounds, the people being the appellants, expressed the opinion that the case did not call for the imposition of costs or extra allowance against the people, made by the court below.<sup>46</sup>

The statute under which the action was brought expressly requires that the people should be made parties defendant. This requirement is in the public interest, and is provided that the attorney general may have a standing in the action to compel the plaintiff to establish a title free from reasonable doubt. . . . We are not persuaded by the contention of the learned counsel for the respondent that costs and allowances were awarded against the appellant properly under § 3241 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section on its face relates to 'an action or a special proceeding brought by a public officer, pursuant to any provision of law.' The plaintiff in this action is a private corporation, and not a 'public officer.' But, argues the learned counsel, the examiner of titles under the statute is a public officer, and he is the real plaintiff. This contention is naive, but not convincing." 1. Appeals.

A writ of error is the proper proceeding to bring from the Philippines to the Supreme Court of the United States a case on the registration of a land title.<sup>47</sup>

The Supreme Court of the United States, as heretofore stated, has held that one who, having actual notice of registration proceedings (though not a party to them), was defeated in the state court on a writ of prohibition brought by him, could not raise the question as to the unconstitutionality of the act as lacking in provisions for notice, by writ of error, so as to give the court jurisdiction to pass upon the question;<sup>48</sup> but

It is a proceeding in rem under a statute of the type of the Torrens act, such as was discussed in Tyler v. Judges of Ct. of Registration (1900) 175 Mass. 71, 51 L.R.A. 433, 55 N. E. 812. It is nearer to law than to equity, and is an assertion of legal title; but we think it unnecessary to put it into either pigeon-hole. A writ of error is the general method of bringing cases to this court, an appeal the exception, confined to equity in the main. There is no reason for not applying the general rule to this case."

<sup>5</sup> *Lewis v. An appeal may be allowed to the supreme court, if prayed at the time of entering the order or decree, and upon like terms as in other suits in equity. A writ of error may be sued out of the supreme court within two years after the entry of the order or decree, and not afterward." The court observed that the act was intended

But the time occupied by the court below in taking under consideration a motion for a new trial is not part of the time within which an appeal must be taken after receipt of a copy of the decree of the land registration court.<sup>6</sup>

Where there is a question as to whether the premises belonged to the public, there is no impropriety in the attorney general entering an appeal through the authorized attorneys of the town; it is not necessary that he act personally.<sup>7</sup>

It has been held in New York that in counties where there is a registrar a notice of appeal from a judgment of registration should be entered on the certificates in the registrar's office.<sup>8</sup>

In Massachusetts, where registration proceedings are brought in the land court, certain appeals are allowed to the superior court, and in some cases to the supreme judicial court. A number of cases have arisen as to the construction of this branch of the act and of amendments thereto. As the matter is one peculiar to the jurisdiction (though there is some similarity in the Hawaiian act), the cases are not discussed here. A list of them may be found in the note.<sup>9</sup>

k. Effect of decree in general.

For effect of decree attacked for fraud, see infra, subd. III. l.

It is the general theory that a title is created by the decree and certificate of registration.<sup>10</sup> The few cases that have arisen as to opening a decree for reasons other than fraud leave the matter in a good deal of confusion. A decree is not effective as to unrelinquished rights of the United States.<sup>11</sup>

In the Philippines it has been held that the court of land registration has no power whatever to open a decree and alter a certificate of registration on the ground that, on different evidence from that originally presented, a different result might have been reached.<sup>12</sup>

In Hawaii it has been held that a decree registering the title in an applicant and adjudging that the defendants had no interest therein is conclusive upon such defendants if they do not appeal, although they desired to make a defense which the registration court erroneously decided it had no jurisdiction to pass upon.<sup>13</sup>

But it has also been held there that a decree might be modified on motion of

This is probably the ground of the decision in Cusar v. Insular Government (1909) 13 Philippine, 319, where the court recognized that, in the absence of fraud, the only way to correct a decree was by appeal, and that if the appeal was not entered within the proper time, the decree must stand; but nevertheless held that, inasmuch as, owing to a mistake in the proceedings, there had been a decree for the registration of much more land than was owned by the petitioner, to the prejudice of the government, the error ought to be corrected "in order to avoid prejudice to the interest of the government, and in view of the provisions of § 66 of act No. 926." Section 66, however, does not seem to be applicable to the situation.

<sup>12</sup> In Cuyugan v. Sy Quia (1913) 24 Philippine, 567, where, several years after the grant of certificate of registration, the city of Manila appeared and claimed that there had been a mistake in boundaries material to it, as it was about to condemn some of the land, and the court thereupon had a hearing and opened the decree and made a new adjudication as to boundaries, it was held that this was without any jurisdiction on the part of the court.

<sup>13</sup> Paahao v. Swinton (1910) 20 Haw. 355, where, after the decree, said defendants brought an action in equity against the registered owners of the land to reform a deed which they alleged had, by mistake and by fraud, conveyed the entire tract of land when it was only intended to con-

the applicant eleven days after it was entered, on the ground that if the rights had not been lost by negligence or by unreasonable delay the decree might be amended on motion as to mere clerical errors, or by the insertion or striking out of any matter which would have been inserted or omitted as a matter of course if it had been asked for at the hearing as necessary or proper to carry into effect the decision of the court.<sup>14</sup>

It has been held in Illinois that the court at a subsequent term has no power to vacate and set aside a decree registering the title, although it was argued that, as it appeared from the cross-petition filed on the motion that the applicant was not the owner of the premises sought to be registered, therefore the court did not have jurisdiction to make the first decree, and therefore the decree was void, and might be attacked by cross-petition or otherwise at a subsequent term.<sup>15</sup>

It has been held in Colorado that a decree would be conclusive against a railroad company as an unknown owner where the applicant had no reason to suppose it claimed any interest in the land;<sup>16</sup> but, on appeal, the matter was sent back for the lower court to determine simply whether the company still had the title.<sup>17</sup>

In Oregon it has been said that the court has power to set the decree aside on reasonable grounds.<sup>18</sup>

vey one half thereof, the fraud being that of one of the grantees; and in such action they alleged the registration proceedings, and that they opposed the registration, and insisted that the deed was fraudulent and should be avoided and annulled, or, if established at all, it should first be so reformed as to convey only one half of the property, but that the court of land registration ruled that it did not possess equity powers such as to authorize it to reform the deed in question. The court said: "The court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and power to hear evidence and to determine the title to the land in question, the ruling that it did not possess equity powers to reform the deed, and for that reason would not hear the evidence as to the alleged fraud, is wholly immaterial so far as the question before us is concerned. The parties had the right to present their evidence and to have it considered by the court, but, failing to appeal from the decree, they are now bound by it." "While it is true the court does not possess the general powers of either courts of law or of equity, and its jurisdiction is limited to the determination of the status of the title to land, nevertheless, for that single purpose, its powers are peculiarly adapted and are ample and complete. It does not possess power to reform a deed, but it may determine the validity of a deed, and accordingly, it may hear and consider any competent evidence to the end that a decree may be entered declaring in whom the title or any interest, legal or equitable, in land, is vested, whether in the applicant or in any other person, notwithstanding the express terms of any deed or instrument."

asked to have the decree set aside. Whether the court meant to suggest or not that an original bill in the nature of a bill of review might have been filed is not clear where it says: "In considering the power of a court to set aside a final decree entered at a subsequent term, this court, in Ernst Tosetti Brewing Co. v. Koehler (1902) 200 Ill. 373, 65 N. E. 636, said: 'A decree regularly entered cannot be altered or amended after the term has elapsed, except for the correction of matters of form or clerical errors. . . . The proper method of impeaching and setting aside a decree after the term is to file an original bill in the nature of a bill of review, when such decree may be set aside, reversed, or modified, according to the equities of the parties. Adamski v. Wiczorek (1897) 170 Ill. 373, 48 N. E. 951.'"

In Minnesota it has been held that a decree is void as against those who are not included as parties, against the advice of the examiner, and their privies.<sup>19</sup>

Assignee in bankruptcy.

It has been held in the Federal court in Massachusetts that an assignee in bankruptcy who has been notified of the registration proceedings and makes no objection to the registration of title is not estopped thereafter, on discovering that he has rights in the land, to bring a bill as soon as possible after he makes discovery of these rights, seeking a conveyance of the land as against a party who was not a holder for value and in good faith.<sup>20</sup>

County and county officer.

A county which was made a party to a proceeding to register land, wherein it was found that tax certificates held by a party were void for reasons entitling her to refundment, cannot defend against an application by such party for refundment on the ground that the finding that the certificates were not void was due to the fraud of the holder, as the county is bound by the decree, the fraud, if any there was, being simply in failing to adduce testimony to prove the validity of the certificates.<sup>21</sup> But where the holder of a tax title conveys the property to one who registers the title under the act, a purchaser from such grantee is not entitled to demand of the county auditor, who was not a party to the registration proceedings, that he indorsed the deed "Taxes paid," while it appears on the records of the auditor's office that taxes prior to those for which the land was sold and the tax title made are unpaid.<sup>22</sup>

Minnesota sixty-day clause.

A statute permitting one having an interest or lien, and not actually notified, to come in and answer within sixty days after decree, on affidavit (as to lack of notice) made by the person answering, or by someone in his behalf, having knowledge of the facts, is satisfied by the affidavit of one member of a partnership, stating that his firm had not been notified, without negating possible knowledge of the proceeding on the part of his partner.<sup>23</sup> Such statute is also satisfied by the affidavit of the president of a corporation as to the absence of notice or information received by the corporation, without negating notice on the part of the president or other members of the corporation.<sup>24</sup>

An affidavit is not insufficient in order to let in a lienor to defend under the sixty-day clause because it states that the lien claim was filed with the register of deeds, whereas the act states that liens are to be filed with the registrar of seasonable motion and good cause shown, to set it aside." On the merits the case was for the defendant, except that, as he had withdrawn money deposited by him in the court below, according to an order of that court, to repay the plaintiff for taxes and improvements, and as he announced that he was at all times ready to abide the decision of the lower court, it was ordered that a decree be entered giving the plaintiff a lien upon the premises for the amount of such deposit, and unless the defendant paid the money within ninety days there might be a foreclosure to satisfy such lien and the costs of the sale.

for the years 1891 to 1896, inclusive, have not been paid, we are of the opinion he was justified in refusing to certify as requested. We are unable to concur in the view that the registration of titles under the so-called Torrens system enlarges the powers of the county auditor. The auditor was not a party to such proceedings, and, independent of the question whether the same added to the rights of appellant, such registration did not operate to change the records of his office."

<sup>23</sup> Reed v. Siddall (1903) 89 Minn. 417, 95 N. W. 303, the statute providing that "any person having an interest in or lien upon the land who has not been actually served with process or notified of the filing of the application or the pendency thereof may at any time within sixty days after the entry of such decree, and not afterwards, appear and file his sworn answer to such application, . . . provided, however, that such person had no notice or information of the filing of such application or the pendency of the proceeding during the pendency thereof, or until within three months of the time of the filing of such answer, which facts shall be made to appear before answering by the affidavit of the person answering or the affidavit of someone in his behalf having knowledge of the facts."

titles, as, under the Torrens system, the register of deeds is the registrar of titles.<sup>25</sup>

It has been held that where a title had been registered in the applicant, the decree stating that the premises were in possession of another under a contract of purchase, and lienors were allowed, under the sixty-day statute, to come in and claim mechanics' liens, that the person in possession could not appeal from an order of the court denying him leave to contest the liens, as such an order was discretionary, although in the registration proceeding the applicant had stipulated that such possessor should have such leave.<sup>26</sup>

"Bound by the decree."

Persons desiring to file a mechanics' lien on property which is afterwards registered, but who, by mistake, file on other property, and who are not named in the registration proceedings, are bound by the decree of registration in favor of an applicant, who knew nothing of the alleged lien, and consequently they cannot take advantage of a statute excluding persons "bound by the decree."<sup>27</sup>

1. Fraud.

While the statutes in general make certain express exceptions in case of fraud, it has been held that such express exceptions are not necessary to sustain an attack based on fraud. Thus it has been held in Minnesota that a decree of registration under the Torrens law could be attacked on the ground that it was obtained by fraud although the statute contained no express exception in favor of the owner of the land which had been fraudulently registered in the name of such other person, as the legislature could not be deemed to have left the true owner in such case with only his right of action against the person who had defrauded him and the claim upon the assurance fund provided by the statute.<sup>28</sup>

The court considered that the act made the general statutes relating to the vacating and opening of ordinary judgments inapplicable, and that the person who sought equitable relief must proceed promptly after notice of the fraud, but that the matter was governed by general equitable considerations, and that the person so seeking was, of course, subject to all the restrictions and exceptions applicable in proceedings in equity; that the sixty-day limitation contained in the act had no application; and that if the defrauded party was not guilty of laches he might attack the decree on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, so long as the land stood registered in the name of the party who was guilty of the fraud.<sup>29</sup> Thus, where the name of a claimant is known to an applicant, either from the report of the examiner or from other sources, the summons cannot be served on such claimant by publication unless his name appears in the summons, as he is not an "unknown party," the concealment of his claim is a fraud on the court, and

Siddall* (Minn.) supra, where, after a title had been registered in favor of an applicant, the decree stating that one S., who was a party, was in possession under a contract of purchase, certain lienors, under the sixty-day clause, were permitted to come in and make claims for mechanics', etc., liens upon the property, and it was held that the application of S. to come in and contest the liens was within the discretion of the court, and that the court having denied it, he had no claim to appeal, and that it was immaterial that S. had an understanding with the original applicant that S. should have a house built on the premises by a third person (with whom the lien claimants contracted), and that, on paying for the property, he should receive a deed for the same, and that a stipulation was filed in the proceedings by the applicant, to the effect that if the decree was opened for the lienors, S. should be permitted to come in and defend against them. It is stated in the opinion that S. claimed that he had no notice of any lien claims upon the property until a certain date; but whether this date was before or after the decree does not appear.

<sup>28</sup> Baart v. Martin (1906) 99 Minn. 197, 116 Am. St. Rep. 394, 108 N. W. 945, where the registered owner, who was subsequent to the first registered owner, was a party to the fraud of such first registered owner. The court states that the only Torrens statutes which make no express exceptions in cases of fraud are those of Minnesota and the Fiji Islands and the Colorado statute, which is based upon the Minnesota statute, and it reviews the statutes generally as to fraud.

But a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration, without notice, who relies on the registration proceedings, will be protected where the fraud or want of jurisdiction does not appear from the judgment or the proceedings.<sup>81</sup> Such a decision seems to leave the innocent holder where he was before the Torrens law, for he seems he must examine the proceedings for registration. Thus, the court in the case last cited says: "Where the decree is procured by fraud, actual or constructive, as where claimants known to the applicant are not named as parties or served in the proceedings, it does not bind the claimants so omitted.

If the want of jurisdiction due to the failure to serve known claimants appears affirmatively from the judgment roll itself, the judgment is void as against such claimants and may be attacked collaterally. RILEY v. PEARSON, supra. But where neither in the proceedings themselves nor by the records the existence of an unnamed claimant is shown, though the applicant knows that there is such a claimant, the want of jurisdiction does not appear from the judgment roll itself, and the decree is not subject to collateral attack."

A number of cases have arisen under the exception of fraud in § 38 of the Philippine act.<sup>82</sup>

In order to apply under § 38 for a

A person who is misdescribed in the summons knowingly, as bearing her former husband's name when she has been remarried, who for many years has resided out of the state, no personal service being made upon her, and she in no way appearing in the proceedings, is not estopped by the decree from obtaining relief against a person to whom that decree has adjudged title. Arnold v. Smith (1913) 121 Minn. 116, 140 N. W. 748; the court referring to Riley v. Pearson, and saying: "Mr. Justice Bunp has recently delivered an opinion upon a kindred question in RILEY v. PEARSON, and the reasoning of that case is applicable here, as is also that of Baart v. Martin (Minn.) supra. The essence of these decisions is that failure to name a known party defendant in published service is a fraud upon the court, which vitiates the judgment as to such party on collateral attack. This court adheres to the rule that, in cases where there is no personal service, care must be taken to name the defendant correctly, and we have held that the use of a wrong initial will prevent the acquisition of jurisdiction over the real party defendant."

<sup>81</sup> Henry v. White (1913) 123 Minn. 183, 143 N. W. 324, where an applicant, after having made an unrecorded mortgage, applies to register his title, and fraudulently omits to mention the mortgage, or to make the mortgagee a party, and the decree is entered without mention of the mortgage, and thereafter the applicant conveys the property for a valuable consideration to a purchaser, who relies on the registration proceedings, and has no notice or knowledge of the mortgage, such purchaser obtains a good title as against the mortgagee. The court referred to the fact that in RILEY v. PEARSON, ante, 7, the fact that known claimants were omitted appeared from the judgment roll itself as well as from the records in the office of the register of deeds, and there was no question of innocent purchaser in that case; and the court continued and said: "In RILEY v. L.R.A. 1916D.

PEARSON, the fact that known claimants were omitted appeared from the judgment roll itself, as well as from the records in the office of the register of deeds. No question of innocent purchaser was involved in that case. It may be correct, though we do not so decide, that a decree that is void and subject to collateral attack would not be validated by a transfer of the title to a purchaser, though he paid a valuable consideration and had no actual notice of the facts which made the decree void. But where, as in the instant case, the fraud or want of jurisdiction does not appear from the judgment or the proceedings, and where such proceedings are absolutely regular on their face, one who purchases from the registered owner for a valuable consideration, in reliance upon the judgment, and without notice or anything to put him on inquiry, takes the title free from all encumbrances and adverse claims, excepting only such estates, mortgages, liens, charges, and interests as may be noted in the last certificate of title in the office of the registrar." Rev. Laws 1905, § 3393."

<sup>82</sup> Section 38 of the act (No. 496) provides that a decree of registration shall be subject, however, "to the right of any person deprived of land or of any estate or interest therein by decree of registration obtained by fraud to file in the court of land registration a petition for review within one year after entry of the decree, provided no innocent purchaser for value has acquired an interest."

Thus, the real owner may, within one year, review the decree provided no innocent purchaser for value has acquired an interest, when the decree of registration has been obtained by fraud. Salva v. Salvador (1910) 18 Philippine, 193, where the court found that, on the evidence, the original applicant had acted with fraud.

Where, within a year after decree of registration, the opponent asked to have the judgment reconsidered on the ground that the applicant had maliciously made no mention of the petitioners as occupants of the property, and on the hearing it appeared that the opponents were in possesreview within one year on the ground of fraud, two things are necessary: First, the applicant must have an estate or interest in the land; and, second, must show fraud. Mere claim of ownership is not sufficient, and fraud alone is not sufficient.<sup>33</sup>

It has been held that the occupant of the land is not entitled to open a decree where he has not been named in the proceedings, where, notwithstanding that the statute requires that the application should name the occupant, those applying had omitted the occupant because they honestly believed that he occupied the land simply as their tenant, and that it was unnecessary to name him.<sup>34</sup> It will be observed that the court in this case takes a different view of "fraud" from the Minnesota court, and that the result would seem to be perilous for the real owner.

sion of some part of the premises, and there was some question, it seems, as to when their possession began, the court ordered a survey and directed that the original applicant should have a judgment registering title excluding "the portions of land owned by the opponents." Cruz v. De Leon (1912) 21 Philippine, 199. It seems that the land "owned" was the land of which the opponents were in possession, and had been, and their predecessors before them, for more than ten years. The court did not discuss the question of fraud, but it seems, must have allowed the reconsideration on that ground.

But upon an application to set aside a decree of registration on the ground that the person registered committed a fraud upon the movers when alleging in his petition that no other person, with the exception of the applicant, claimed any interest in the land sought to be registered, where the movers had not been in possession, their interest in the lands being based entirely upon the fact of their having cultivated them, in holding that there was no proof of fraud, the court pointed out that the applicant was without the means of knowledge which he would have possessed had the moving parties been living upon the property; but the court considered that the claim was without any legal foundation at all. Lernay Martinez v. Antonio (1906) 6 Philippine, 236.

In De Guzman v. Ortiz (1909) 12 Philippine, 701, the court refused to interfere with a decree denying a review of the case where the person asking such review had not proved nor attempted to prove any ownership or real right, and held that her claim of fraud in that she was not cited to appear fell to the ground where it was shown that her son, who occupied the same house with her, was made a party, and that the applicant had mentioned her as one of the persons who was living on the land, L.R.A.1916D.

The year under § 38 within which the decree obtained by fraud may be reviewed provided no innocent purchaser for value has acquired an interest begins to run from the time of the entry of the final decree on an appeal.<sup>35</sup>

The Massachusetts certificate of title is no defense to a bill in equity by an assignee in bankruptcy, alleging fraud as against creditors, and seeking a conveyance from one who is not a holder in good faith for value.<sup>36</sup>

m. Registry as transfer.

"The act of registration is the operative act to convey title."<sup>37</sup> After the title has been registered, a deed or mortgage by the owner does not pass the title, which is only passed by the act of registration itself; consequently the giving of a deed or mortgage by the registered owner will be of no effect if subsequent-that the land was so small that she must have seen the notice posted thereon by the sheriff, together with another reason, possibly conclusive, which is not clearly stated.

Apurado* (Philippine) supra, the court pointing out that the statute further provided that no certificates of title shall be issued until after the expiration of the period for perfecting a bill of exceptions for filing, showing that the certificate of registration which concludes the whole matter and is the "execution" of the judgment of registration shall not be issued until the time for appeal has elapsed, there being a further provision that "at the end of the proceedings on appeal, the clerk of the appellate court in which final decision was made shall certify to the court of land registration the final decision on the appeal, and the court of land registration shall enter the final decree in the case, in accordance with the certificate of the clerk of the appellate court in which final decision was made."

<sup>36</sup> Morris v. Small (1908) 160 Fed. 142, where the court pointed out that the Massachusetts statute declared that the proceedings were proceedings in rem, while the action in question was a bill in equity, that is, a suit in personam, and referred to a number of the sections of the Massachusetts statute, including § 54, providing that "in all cases of registration which are procured by fraud, the owner may pursue all his legal and equitable remedies against the parties to such fraud, without prejudice, however, to the rights of any innocent holder for value of a certificate of title."

ly he gives another mortgage to a third party, which is duly registered before the mortgage or deed first given.<sup>38</sup>

It has been held in the Philippines that an attachment duly entered upon the register against the grantor of a deed after the deed was given, but before it was registered, was prior to the deed, as it was the act of registration which passed the title.<sup>39</sup>

n. Assurance fund.

Most of the acts provide for an assurance fund,<sup>40</sup> and require from an applicant for new registration a payment usually of ₱ of 1 per cent for such fund.<sup>41</sup> This fund is, in general, for the indemnity of those who lose their property through fraud or error, and who are without other means of redress.

A purchaser in good faith, for a valuable consideration, from the owner of the registered title, who has registered his transfer and taken out a certificate of title in himself without notice or knowledge of any defect, has a cause of action against the county treasurer for the value of the land, where his grantor's title rested upon a tax title based on taxes assessed against the land when it belonged to the United States, under the statute providing that "any person who, without negligence on his part, sustains any loss or damage by reason of any omission, mistake or misfeasance of the registrar or his deputy, or of any examiner or of any clerk of court, or of his deputy, in the performance of their respective duties under this law, . . . may institute an action in the district court to recover compensation out of the assurance fund for such loss or damage;" that in such actions "the county treasurer, in his official capacity, shall be the sole defendant;" and that the examiner, among other things, "shall search all public records, and fully investigate all facts pertaining to the title which may be brought to his notice, and shall file in a case a full report thereof, together with his opinion upon the title."<sup>42</sup>

The case arose upon a demurrer, and the court stated that it was sufficient upon the question of negligence to say

<sup>38</sup> Brace v. Superior Land Co. (1911) 65 Wash. 681, 118 Pac. 910, where the statute provided: "No voluntary instrument of conveyance, except a will and a lease, for a term not exceeding three years, purporting to convey or affect registered land, shall take effect as a conveyance, or bind the land; but shall operate only as a contract between the parties, and as evidence of the authority to the registrar of titles to make registration. The act of registration shall be the operative act to convey or affect the land." In that case the holder of a mortgage was named in the proceedings for registration, but by mistake this mortgage was omitted from the decree and from the registered certificate. Subsequently the registered owner made a deed to a third party which was in law a mortgage, and delivered his duplicate certificates of registration to such third party, who, however, was unable to get his mortgage or his deed registered because the taxes had not been paid. Thereafter the registered owner procured the temporary delivery of the certificate to a third party from whom he wished a loan, and while in the possession of such third party the omission of the old mortgage was discovered, and a new mortgage was given by the registered owner to the old mortgagee, who thereupon paid the back taxes and registered the new mortgage. And it was held that the new mortgagee, by virtue of this new mortgage, given because her old mortgage had been omitted by mistake from the registration certificate and decree, had a prior lien to the person who had the unregistered deed. The decision of the court seems mainly grounded on the fact that the person who had the unregistered deed was not a purchaser in good L.R.A.1916D.

faith, for the reason that he could not be a purchaser at all under the statute until his deed was registered. It does not seem necessarily to rest the decision upon the fact that the old mortgagee had given and paid additional money, namely, the taxes, but points this out as an equitable consideration. And also points out that the original old mortgage was given for the purchase price of the property (the court declined to pass on the constitutionality of the act, as not involved in the decision).

<sup>39</sup> Buzon v. Licauco (1909) 13 Philippine, 354, where the statute provided that "no deed, mortgage, lease, or other voluntary instrument, except a will, purporting to convey or affect registered land, shall take effect as a conveyance or bind the land, but shall operate only as a contract between the parties, and as evidence of authority to the clerk or register of deeds to make registration,"—the act of registration being "the operative act to convey and affect the land."

It has been held in the Philippines that a person receiving a patent from the government to a mineral claim, which requires registration to make it effective, can only have the same registered by the payment of the ₱ of 1 per cent for the assurance fund, as in ordinary cases. Loewenstein v. Page (1910) 16 Philippine, 84.

that the complaint did not disclose affirmatively that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, as purchasing the land in reliance upon the certificate of title, and without making an independent investigation of the title, is not sufficient to establish negligence, as the plaintiff had the right to rely upon the certificate as evidence that the holder thereof possessed a title entitled to registration. It was objected that the statute did not undertake to insure the title against rights arising or existing under the laws or Constitution of the United States, where it provided that every person receiving a certificate, etc., should hold the same free from all encumbrances and adverse claims except, among other things, "liens, claims or rights arising or existing under the laws or the Constitution of the United States, which this state cannot require to appear of record." The court said: "It is not within the power of the state to bar the rights of the United States, and the registration proceedings do not purport to bar such rights. But the purpose of the registration act is to insure to the one to whom a certificate of title is issued, and to his vendees, an absolutely perfect and indefeasible title free from all claims of every kind and nature except those expressly noted upon the certificate, and to put such title beyond attack. A subsequent purchaser has the right to rely upon such certificate as an assurance that the court which decreed its issuance had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the title, and that the holder thereof possesses a title which the law authorized to be registered. If this be not true, if the court in fact had no jurisdiction to render the decree for the reason that the land still belonged to the United States, and if the fact that the United States had not parted with its title was not ascertained and reported by the examiner, the purchaser sustains a loss by reason of the neglect of the examiner which entitles him to reimbursement out of the assurance fund under § 6943, Gen. Stat. 1913."<sup>43</sup>

o. Miscellaneous.

The notice of six months provided for within which claims for private lands must be presented to the land court for registration when the President has taken land for naval or military purposes does not begin to run as to persons living upon or in visible possession of the land, until the notice is served upon them personally; and as to that class, it is of no consequence when the notice is published or when it was posted.<sup>44</sup> Certain miscellaneous cases are referred to in the notes.<sup>45</sup>

IV. Foreign decisions of general interest.

a. In general.

These cases are from British possessions and from England. The statutes vary much even in Australia, the home of the Torrens law, and have been greatly amended and changed in the various jurisdictions from time to time. For example, a recent book on the system in Canada only assumes to deal at length with the acts of a few of the Canadian provinces (Thom, 1912), though not confined to them. The cases that have <sup>45</sup> It was held in Re Lewers & Cooke (1908) 18 Haw. 625, that the petitioner, in seeking to register a title depending upon an unexecuted equitable decree in another matter, was, "as against the holder of the outstanding legal title, in the same position as a party asking the aid of the court of chancery in executing a former decree; and it is well established that he must take the risk of opening up such decree for re-examination." Quoted and followed on an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in (1911) 222 U. S. 285, 56 L. ed. 202, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 94.

Where a club or association not having any existence as a legal entity agreed to have the title to the property placed in the name of one of its members, which was done, and he collected rents, and failed to account therefor, and further claimed, upon proceedings to make him account, that he had title to the property, and that he had L.R.A.1916D.

bought it with his own funds, the court decreed a conveyance by him of the property, and that he must account. Uy Aloc v. Cho Jan Ling (1911) 19 Philippine, 202.

In view of the first headnote in Broce v. Broce (1905) 4 Philippine, 611, it may be noted that the certificate of land registration there referred to was under the Spanish law, and prior to the Philippine act of 1902. So, the case of Veguillas v. Jaucian (1913) 25 Philippine, 315, seems to have related to the old form of registration, and not to the new.

It may be noted that there was probably a question of jurisdiction in Lerma y Martinez v. Antonio (1906) 6 Philippine, 236, but the case is not fully reported in regard to it; also that the reported facts are insufficient to the full understanding of Pollard v. Burchard (1908) 199 Mass. 376, 85 N. E. 444, holding that the same parties on a subsequent application were not estopped by the prior adjudication as to lands not included therein.

arisen under these foreign statutes are very numerous. Over twenty years ago a volume was written on the Victorian act of 1890 (Duffy & Eagleson, 1895) although it cites cases from other colonies.

There are numerous cases in which the registration of title questions are complicated by intricate statutes relating to Crown grants or mining leases, native land acts, and the like, to such an extent as to render them of little value beyond the jurisdiction. There are many other cases dealing with registration matters of importance which also depend to such an extent upon the varying local statutes as to be of little general value; such, for example, as those dealing with caveats, injunctions, etc. There have been also, of course many cases of local importance which are of no present practical use in view of amendments to or changes in the statute.

The selection of subjects as of general importance or interest is, of course, wholly arbitrary, and is not to be taken as meaning that the subjects excluded may not be of interest and value to those desiring to make a study of the general subject.

Adverse possession under these acts may be viewed (1) as a mere protection, <sup>46</sup> Staughton v. Brown (1875) 1 Vict. L. R. 150, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 213 (but a new trial was ordered, as the court was not satisfied that the defendant's evidence as to possession was sufficient to cover all of the land claimed by him).

Thus, the court ordered the certificate of title of a corporation to be delivered up to be canceled, where the corporation, in its application to have land brought under the act, stated that the possessor was only a trespasser, and obtained a certificate, and afterwards failed in an action against such possessor, who set up a statutory title to the land by length of possession. Ex parte Rigby (1883) 9 Vict. L. R. 417, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 459.

As mere protection.

The rights of one in adverse possession, not heard at the time of the granting of a certificate of title to another, are not, in general, disturbed by such certificate.

Thus, under the Victoria statute making the land included in a certificate or registered instrument subject "to any rights subsisting under any adverse possession of such land," the person in possession, when sued in ejectment by the holder of a certificate of title, may show that he has been in possession for the statutory period.<sup>48</sup>

So, where a purchaser from a registered proprietor went into possession and later registered his title and received a certificate for another piece of land, owing to a mistake of roads (probably by the title office), others who later got a certificate for the land bought by the first purchaser could not oust him, his possession having been long enough to make a title.<sup>47</sup>

A person who has a good title by adverse possession may restrain an applicant who applies to have the land brought under the act.<sup>48</sup>

Similarly, under the South Australia act,<sup>49</sup> protection was afforded to a defendant "adversely in actual occupation of and rightfully entitled to such land" at the time of the plaintiff's certificate, being the one issued on first bringing the

L. R. 265, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 553, overruling Ex parte Brown (1879) 5 Vict. L. R. 5, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 381.

So, the holder of the equitable title, who has been in possession long enough to obtain a title by adverse possession of the premises, may properly bring an action to prevent one desiring to bring land under the act from doing so. Hodgson v. Hunter (1872) 3 Vict. Rep. 61, 3 Austr. Jur. 13, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 203, holding that in such action the owners of the legal title should be brought in.

land under the act, and continuing therein, and whose land was, by mistake of a surveyor, wrongfully included therein.<sup>50</sup>

So, a certificate is void as against occupation by one claiming under a person deprived.<sup>1</sup>

It has been held in Alberta, on ejectment by the registered owner, that the defendant, who had been in possession of a part of the land at the time that the land was brought under the act by the plaintiffs, was entitled to succeed on the ground of adverse possession under § 44 of the act, providing that the certificate of title should be conclusive with certain exceptions "except so far as regards any portion of land by wrong description of boundaries or parcels included in such certificate of title."<sup>2</sup>

It has been stated that in Queensland the profession is not agreed on the subject.<sup>3</sup>

Right to register.

One having a good title by adverse possession to land not under the act may have his title registered and obtain a certificate.<sup>4</sup>

—right as against registered titles.

Whether one claiming land by adverse possession may have his title registered as against a registered holder is considered differently in different jurisdictions.

It was held in Victoria that the registrar cannot register lands on the application of one claiming by adverse possession, when the lands are already registered to another;<sup>5</sup> but this is otherwise under the act of 1904.<sup>6</sup>

Under the New Zealand act a title cannot be acquired by adverse possession against the registered proprietor.<sup>7</sup>

But it has been held that there was nothing in the Honduras act inconsistent with the acquisition of a title by adverse possession against the registered holder, which commenced subsequent to the registration.<sup>8</sup>

These cases would seem to clarify any obscurity in Wadham v. Buttle (1879) 13 South Austr. L. R. 1, where one suing in ejectment on his certificate, less than two years old, was opposed by the claim of adverse possession for more than twenty years, and it was held that the only point was whether the plaintiff had obtained his certificate by fraud, by falsely swearing that there was then no adverse possession; otherwise his certificate would be conclusive.

<sup>3</sup> It is stated in Maltby v. Pang See [1910] St. R. Qd. 12, that "the profession are not agreed whether adverse possession can be asserted against a registered title," and that the editors of the Queensland real property acts apprehend that the law in Queensland is similar "to that of New South Wales, which is, that adverse possession is not effective against the registered proprietor in an action of ejectment by him if the action is not expressly barred against the person against whom the action is brought."

In Re Eaton (Qd.) supra, it was held that a purchaser after twenty years' possession was entitled to register the land in his name where he had bought the land from a Crown grantee, paid the money, took the L.R.A. 1916D.

Crown grant and entered, the seller having signed no transfer, and the sale note which he gave having been lost, and the seller having disappeared many years before.

In Re Anderton (1908)—Alberta, L. R. —, 8 West. L. R. 319, the court stated that he found that such applications were granted in different states of Australia, not only those whose land title acts contained special clauses dealing with the rights of persons claiming by possession, and permitting them to secure registration, but also in those states whose acts "like our own do not contain any specific reference to the question," and that the applicant came within the statute; but the court declined to register the title on the ground that while the twelve years' possession had been sufficiently shown, it was not shown that there might not have been some person against whom the statute did not begin to run; that is, a remainderman or reversioner, etc.

<sup>7</sup> In Ex parte Campbell, 12 N. Z. Gaz. L. R. 484 (where there was no possession), it was held that the statute of limitations could not run against a mortgagee under the provision of the land transfer act that "after land has become subject to this act no title thereto, or any right, privilege, or easement in, upon or over the same shall be acquired by possession or user adversely to or in derogation of the title of the registered proprietor." This case overruled Shirley v. Tapper (1904) 24 N. Z. L. R. 849, where it was held that there is nothing in the act to obviate the effect of the statute of limitation as to mortgages.

Other cases will be found in the notes.<sup>9</sup>

It is not in general intended to deal with questions between landlord and tenant, but only with some special features of the acts as to persons in possession.

The Victoria act<sup>10</sup> makes the certificate subject to the interest of any tenant of the land where the possession is not adverse. Thus, the possession of one entering under a purchase of land is that of a tenant not adverse to the person who sold it to him.<sup>11</sup> So, one in possession under an instrument which is both a lease and a contract for sale is ahead of a subsequent mortgage,<sup>12</sup> and the interest of the tenant of a mortgagor whose mortgage was made after the tenancy began is not adverse to the mortgagee.<sup>13</sup> And though in general a vendor who remains in possession after a conveyance is not a tenant at will, but a wrongdoer,<sup>14</sup> where a partly paid vendor remained in possession, and the vendee obtained a certificate and borrowed upon its deposit with the plaintiff, the vendor's right was held superior to that, of the plaintiff.<sup>15</sup>

It appears that in New South Wales the person in possession is not protected,<sup>16</sup> and that the certificate is conclusive against the person in possession, [1897] A. C. (Eng.) 367, holding that there was nothing inconsistent with this in § 30 of the act, which provided: "The person or persons who, according to the entries made according to this chapter in the register, appear to be entitled, according to this chapter, to land, or to any legal estate, interest, power or right in or affecting land, shall be entitled accordingly, and to the exclusion of all other persons, and of all other estates, interests, powers and rights, not being equitable estates or interests, in or affecting the said land or any part thereof; and the register shall be to all intents and purposes whatsoever, and to the exclusion of all other evidence (evidence of fraud only excepted), the foundation, and the evidence of the foundation of the title to the land registered, and to the estates, interests, powers and rights registered; and the registered land, estates, interests, powers and rights respectively may and shall descend, devolve, and be transmitted, dealt with, disposed of, and enjoyed accordingly."

<sup>9</sup> When, subsequent to the defendant's certificate of title, the plaintiff entered, it was held that after he had held adversely for the statutory period he might, by action, have judgment against the defendant, declaring him (the plaintiff) the owner in fee simple; but he could not obtain a certificate, nor have that of the defendant canceled. Wallace v. Potter (1913) — Alberta L. R. —, 10 D. L. R. 594, citing Belize Estate & Produce Co. v. Quilter (Eng.) supra.

Under the English acts permitting registration both of absolute and possessory titles, in Marshall v. Robertson (1905) 50 Sol. Jo. (Eng.) 75, A sold to B, and B got a certificate as having a possessory title by means of a statutory statement by A that he had been in possession for more than the statutory period, and B charged the land to mortgagees, who registered the charge; it was held that the real owner, who was all the time in possession, was entitled to have removed from the title register the entry of B as proprietor and of the mortgagees as proprietors of a charge, and that the onus was on A and B to show that they had title by adverse possession.

It may be noted that in Tasmania, where a woman owner of land under the L.R.A.1916D.

real property act died intestate, and her husband entered and remained for upwards of twelve years, it was held that he acquired title as against his adult children, but not as against an infant grandson. Re Bartlett (1908) 4 Tasmania L. R. 26.

So, when the tenant had a contract of sale from the registered owner, who transferred the land to the plaintiff for a loan, and he sued the tenant in ejectment, judgment was for the defendant. Sandhurst Mut. Permanent Soc. Invest. Bldg. v. Gissing (1889) 15 Vict. L. R. 329, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 466.

Where a certificate issued after a decree in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, but before the certificate was issued, though after the decree, the defendant, being in occupation, granted a lease to A, who afterwards assigned it to B, the plaintiff in said suit could not, in ejectment against B, apply for a rule nisi to enter a caveat in his own favor. Slack v. Downton, 1 Austr. L. T. 2.

<sup>16</sup> The New South Wales act provided (26 Vict. No. 9, § 40; 1900, No. 25, § 42): "40. Notwithstanding the existence in any other person of any estate or interest, whether derived by grant from the Crown or otherwise, which but for this act might be held to be paramount, or to have priority, the registered proprietor of land, or

although the latter but for the act would be entitled to the property.<sup>17</sup>

Thus, a transferee of a mortgage which is indorsed on a certificate of title is not affected by a prior verbal lease for less than three years, as the act does not permit the registration of such a lease.<sup>18</sup>

And a tenant in possession under an unregistered lease for seven years, which was not in the form required to make it capable of registration, may be ejected by a purchaser from the landlord.<sup>19</sup>

In South Australia the early cases seem to leave the matter in some confusion.<sup>20</sup>

Under the statute of 1886, registered of any estate or interest in land, under the provisions of this act, shall, except in case of fraud, hold the same subject to such encumbrances, liens, estates, or interests as may be notified on the folium of the Register Book, constituted by the grant or certificate of title of such land, but absolutely free from all other encumbrances, liens, estates, or interests whatsoever, except the estate or interest of a proprietor claiming the same land under a prior certificate of title or under a prior grant registered under the provisions of this act, and except as regards the omission or misdescription of any right of way or other easement created in or existing upon any land, and except so far as regards any portion of land that may, by wrong description of parcels or of boundaries, be included in the grant, certificate of title, lease, or other instrument evidencing the title of such registered proprietor, not being a purchaser or mortgagee thereof for value, or deriving from or through a purchaser or mortgagee thereof for value."

<sup>20</sup> In Manning v. Crossman (1871) 5 South Austr. L. R. 130, it was held that one claiming under a lease from a registered owner is protected as against a lease for less than three years made by a former owner. One of the judges seemed to consider that a lease for less than three years was void under the act.

Manning v. Crossman (South Austr.) supra, was followed in Trantor v. Lord (1874) 8 South Austr. L. R. 81, where the agreement was a verbal agreement to lease for ten years, which created a tenancy from year to year.

In Buckett v. Knobbe (1874) 8 South Austr. L. R. 86, the registered plaintiff gave the defendant a lease signed by both in the form provided for by the act, but it was only for two years; the court nonsuited the plaintiff, who was suing the tenant in ejectment, but the three judges (one of whom dissented) differed in their views of L.R.A.1916D.

dealings were to be subject to prior unregistered leases, etc., for a term not exceeding one year.<sup>21</sup>

Where the acts of New Zealand had no provision for registering leases for less than three years, the court was of opinion that such a lease gave a legal title to the tenant for the tenancy.<sup>22</sup>

d. Trusts.

In general.

The general theory of most of the acts in British countries is that no trust shall be entered upon the certificate.<sup>23</sup>

It has been held in Victoria that a the effect of the act on leases under three years.

In Hunter v. Player (1875) 9 South Austr. L. R. 100, it was held where one who had agreed to let the plaintiff certain land obtained a clean certificate, that the plaintiff had no claim for right of possession.

But in Franklin v. Ind (1883) 17 South Austr. L. R. 133, it was held that under § 134 of the South Australia act, quoted supra, subd. IV. b, a lessee in possession when land was brought under the act was protected against the fraud of the omission of the lease from the certificate, committed by those who got out the certificate, and against subsequent mala fide transferees and mala fide mortgagees. The expression "adverse," in § 134, means adverse to the certificate. The court referred to the difference in the Victoria act, No. 301, of 1866, § 49.

It should be noted that Franklin v. Ind (South Austr.) was followed in Re Wright, 2 Nicholls & Stops Rep. (Tasmania) 74, where it was held that a bona fide transferee for value was not protected against occupation of one entitled to the land and in possession at the time of the first certificate, and so continuing during the time till the issue of the later certificate to the bona fide purchaser.

<sup>23</sup> For example, the Victoria act (§ 38 of 301 of 1866, § 57 of 1890) provided: "38. The registrar shall not enter in the Register Book notice of any trust, whether express, implied, or constructive; but trusts may be declared by any document, and a duplicate

trustee without power of sale is included in the expression in the statute, "the person claiming to be the owner of the fee simple, either in law or in equity," and as such may make an application to have the land registered in his name under the act;<sup>24</sup> and in New Zealand that one of two trustees who has obtained a transfer to himself, as if he were the sole trustee, and has contracted to sell the land, is entitled to compel specific performance by the purchaser, as he can give a good title.<sup>25</sup>

So, in general, the registrar should not refuse to register a transfer from a trustee, except in case of a manifest breach of trust.<sup>26</sup>

Thus, where trustees transferred the land to beneficiaries, taking the chance that there would be no birth of a possible remainderman, the registrar should not refuse to register the transfer, as there was "no manifest breach of trust."<sup>27</sup>

But cestui qui trustent have a right to caveat with a view to protect their interests.<sup>28</sup>

It may be noted that where trustees under a will renounced, it was held that this effected an intestacy as to land under the act, as the act does not recognize equities.<sup>29</sup>

Transferees of trustees.

In the absence of fraud, the transferee is not "affected by notice, direct or constructive, of any trust or unregistered interest."<sup>30</sup>

Thus, he who takes trust land from a trustee without knowledge that the trustee is committing or intends to commit any fraud is protected.<sup>31</sup> or an attested copy thereof may be deposited with the registrar for safe custody and reference; and the commissioner, should it appear to him expedient so to do, may protect in any way he may deem advisable the rights of the persons for the time being beneficially interested thereunder, or thereby required to give any consent; but the rights incident to any proprietorship or any instrument dealing or matter registered under this act shall not be in any manner affected by the deposit of such duplicate or copy, nor shall the same be registered."

The registrar, should register a transfer to an executrix to whom the first certificate ran "as executrix," as long as he has no express notice of a breach of trust. Re Fairbrother to Allen, 15 N. Z. L. R. 196.

Administrators having a court order giving power of sale, on applying to bring property under the act, met with a controversy, and in compromise sold the property to the adverse party,—this compromise not having court authority. T. 22, where a widow who was administratrix of her husband's estate was registered as the absolute owner of the property of his estate, and it was held that one who sold to her other property, and took in good faith a mortgage on the husband's said property in part payment, was protected, although knowing that the land had been part of her husband's estate and that she was administratrix, as no "fraud" under § 74 of the act of 1890 was shown, as that means moral turpitude, and § 140 of the act of 1890 means that constructive fraud will not invalidate the transferee's title. The court distinguished Droop v. Colonial Bank (1881) 7 Vict. L. R. 71, infra, subd. IV. m. (For the statutes, see infra, subd. IV. f.)

Where an administratrix whose duty was to convey to trustees took a certificate to herself of land under the act, and had other land brought under the act and sold all to her son, who knew the facts, but all acted honestly and with good intent, it was held that the son's registered title was good and that of his mortgagee was good. Public Trustee v. Arthur (1892) 25 South Austr. L. R. 59.

The court stated in McLeod v. Lawson (1906) 8 Ont. Week. Rep. 213 (while perhaps it was not material to the decision), that the provisions of § 103 of the Ontario act indicated that it was the intention of the statute to permit registered owners to deal with land, and third persons to deal with them in respect of the land, although it may appear on the register that the registered owner is a trustee. The statute provided that no notice of any trust is to

But a person who obtains a title by transmission, and as the representative of the holder of a certificate of title, with full notice that such holder is a bare trustee, takes the title subject to the trust, and will be compelled to transfer to the real owner.<sup>32</sup>

Options of purchase.

The cases on options of purchase from those holding in a fiduciary capacity are not entirely clear. It has been held in New Zealand that one taking a lease with an option of purchase, from persons registered as executors (of a deceased registered proprietor), is protected, although he knew the executors were trustees, but did not know the nature of the trust, the court assuming that the option was in excess of the trust powers.<sup>33</sup>

But soon after, the same court declined to extend this principle to the case where trustees made a lease with an option of purchase, covering land which was registered and land which was not registered, and it was held that the instrument was not entitled to registration, and the option, which was in excess of the trustees' authority, should be stricken out of the lease.<sup>34</sup>

And in Alberta it was held that a beneficiary of a decedent's estate might have declared void an option coupled with a lease given to the defendant by the administratrix of such estate, who was registered as owner, but had no power to give such an option.<sup>35</sup>

e. Effect of registration of title in general.

The intent of the statute is that the certificate shall be conclusive in the absence of fraud.<sup>36</sup> be entered on the register, and that describing one as a trustee is not notice of a trust, nor does it impose duty of inquiry.

A fortiori, in North-West. Constr. Co. v. Valle (1906) 16 Manitoba L. Rep. 201, 4 West. L. R. (Can.) 37, where a person purchased land with money of which he was trustee, and sold and transferred the land to a bona fide purchaser with no actual notice or knowledge of such trusteeship, nor any reason to suppose that the trustee was not the beneficial owner in his own right, it was held that the purchaser was protected.

<sup>35</sup> St. Germain v. Renault (1909) 2 Alberta L. R. 371, holding that one taking from an administratrix who is registered as owner a lease with an option of purchase, she having no power to give such an option, cannot, by registering such lease, obtain any right to have the option carried out, although the act, after providing that a person registered in place of a deceased owner shall hold the land upon the trusts, and for the purposes to which the same is applicable, further provided that, for the purpose of any registered dealings, he shall be deemed to be the absolute and beneficial owner thereof, and also provided that except in case of fraud no person taking or proposing to take a transfer, etc., need inquire into the circumstances or considerations under which any owner or any previous owner took title, etc., "nor shall he be affected by notice, direct, implied, or constructive, of any trust or unregistered interest in the land, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding; and the knowledge that any trust or unregistered interest is in existence shall not of itself be imputed as fraud." The court intimated L.R.A. 1916D.

that possibly an assignee of a lease with such an option might have enforced the option.

The New Zealand statutes are absolute as to the nonassailability of the title of one registered as owner, except in the cases expressly mentioned as exceptions. Matai v. Assets Co. (1887) 6 N. Z. L. R. 356.

The registered title, in the absence of fraud, is conclusive. Assets Co. v. Mere Roihi [1905] A. C. (Eng.) 176, 74 L. J. P. C. N. S. 49, 92 L. T. N. S. 397, 21 Times L. R. 311, on appeal from New Zealand.

But in Louden v. Morrison (1895) 14 N. Z. L. R. 245, the court was of the opinion that where the registrar had issued a certificate which by mistake omitted a lease shown on the register, the person to whom the certificate was issued could not get any right against the lessee by such omission, the statute providing that the certificate is to be conclusive evidence unless the contrary be proved by the production of the register.

Where an attorney in fact, whose power of attorney was not broad enough for the purpose, executed an instrument granting an easement over registered land, which was itself registered, it was held that the grantee of the easement, in the absence of fraud, became the duly registered proprietor of the easement, under §§ 36 and 49 of the Victorian act, No. 301, of 1866. Magor v. Donald (1887) 13 Vict. L. R. 255, 8 Austr. L. T. 150, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 266. Section 36 of the act provided: "36. Every grant, and every certificate of title, shall be deemed and taken to be registered under this act when the registrar has marked thereon the volume and folium of the Register Book in which the same is entered; and every instrument purporting to affect land under the operation of this act shall be deemed and taken to be registered

An honest purchaser for value will be protected by his certificate, even against the proper owner.<sup>37</sup>

Effect of nonregistration of instruments.

It is in general provided by the acts that no instrument until registered shall pass any estate or interest in registered land.

It would be hard to say whether this provision means anything more than that a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee in good faith, without notice, who has registered his instrument, will be protected against unregistered instruments.

No difficulty would seem to be found under this provision with the view that the foregoing provision referred to effect upon the land only, and did not make such unregistered instruments invalid as contracts,<sup>38</sup> nor with a holding that equity would specifically enforce such a contract,<sup>39</sup> nor with a holding that an equitable right to have a fraudulent registration set aside will pass by an unregistered deed.<sup>40</sup>

It has, indeed, been held that there was nothing in the English registration act which prevented the passing of a legal estate by a mortgage created by an ordinary deed executed by an owner in fee, whether he was or was not a registered proprietor, subject to the risk of the title being defeated or impaired; but it is not clear that this was necessary for the decision.<sup>41</sup>

On the other hand, it has been said by the English privy council that under the Victoria (Australia) act no interest in the property could effectually pass till registration, and consequently that an unregistered sale was a mere agreement which left a prior equity untouched;<sup>42</sup> but this was possibly not necessary to the decision; nor does it appear whether when a memorial thereof, as hereinafter described, has been entered in the Register Book upon the folium, constituted by the grant or existing certificate of title; and the person named in any grant, certificate of title, or instrument so registered as the grantee or as the proprietor of or having any estate or interest or power shall be deemed and taken to be the duly registered proprietor thereof." For § 49, see infra, subd. IV. f.

So, a bona fide transferee from one whose certificate was not founded on a good title—the native title in part not having been extinguished—was protected. Re Okirae Block (1892) 10 N. Z. L. R. 677.

So, the title of a transferee, bona fide, for valuable consideration, without notice, from a registered owner, is protected as against rights existing before the land was registered. Farah v. Glen Lake Min. Co. (1907) 17 Ont. L. Rep. 1, where it was held also that a purchaser pendente lite was without any actual or constructive notice of the existence of the action or of a previous counterclaim therein, no caution being registered at the time of the transfer.

So, in Central Canada Loan & Sav. Co. v. Porter (1903) 2 Ont. Week. Rep. 137, it was held that judgment in ejectment must be for the plaintiffs, who were purchasers for value of a registered title, and without notice of the paper title of defendant, which was not registered until after the action was brought.

So, the registered owner is protected where he did not know that his grantor got the property by foreclosure of a mortgage of which he was the mortgagee, and such owner had nothing to do with the questions between the mortgagee and the mortgagor. Richards v. Thompson (1911) 4 Sask. L. R. 213, 18 West. L. R. (Can.) 179. L.R.A.1916D.

<sup>39</sup> In Cuthbertson v. Swan (1877) 11 South Austr. L. R. 102, it was held that a contract to sell land under the act would be specifically enforced (or an action for damages maintained on it), overruling Lange v. Ruwoldt (1872) 7 South Austr. L. R. 1, where it was held that an executory contract of sale of registered land, executed by a testator, will not be specifically enforced against his devisees or heirs, as the act does not provide for the registration of such an executory instrument.

It was held in Macindoe v. Wehrle (1913)

the purchaser had later registered the agreement before the suit.

But it has been held in Victoria that a purchaser for value in good faith, from one registered, will be protected against one defrauded by the vendor, although the purchaser, at the time of suit by the person defrauded, had not yet registered his transfer.<sup>43</sup>

And the same principle seems to have been sustained in an obscurely reported case in New Zealand.<sup>44</sup>

And the high court of Australia in a recent decision holds that where a fraudulent transferee from the registered owner, to whom he had not paid the purchase price, mortgaged the land to one who had no actual or constructive notice of the fraud, the mortgage was superior to the interest of the true owner, although neither the mortgage nor the transfer to the mortgagor had been registered.<sup>45</sup>

The court stated that the repeal, so far as inconsistent with the act, of "all laws . . . rules . . . practice," was not sufficient to embrace "the body of law recognized and administered by courts of equity in respect of equitable claims to land arising out of contract or personal confidence." "But," the court continued, "it is said that the words of § 41, 'No instrument, until registered, . . . shall be effectual to pass any estate or interest in any land under the provisions of this act,' have that effect. It is now more than half a century since the Australian Colonies and New Zealand adopted, in substantially the same form, but with some important variations, the system, sometimes called the 'Torrens' system, which is now in New South Wales, embodied in the real property act 1900. With the exception of one decision in South Australia, soon afterwards overruled, the contention of the appellant has never been accepted in any of them." In the same case, Isaacs, J., concurring, said that counsel "contended that the consequence was that until registration no person can acquire any interest in land, legal or equitable. He said that whatever personal liability existed might be enforced as 'a chose in action' against the person liable, but not against the land, for the act recognizes no interests, legal or equitable, except in the registered proprietor. Such a contention is absolutely opposed to all hitherto accepted notions in Australia with regard to the land transfer acts. They have long, and in every state, been regarded as in the main conveyancing enactments, and as giving greater certainty to titles of registered proprietors, but not in any way destroying the fundamental doctrines by which courts of equity have enforced, as against registered proprietors, conscientious obligations entered into by them. The notion that an equitable right is a mere chose in action, once accepted by the court (Finch's Case (1590) 4 Co. Inst. (Eng.) 85), but definitely and finally parted from by Lord Hardwicke in Hopkins v. Hopkins (1738) West, Ch. (Eng.) 606, and Lord St. Leonards, in Stump v. Gaby (1852) 2 DeG. M. & G. (Eng.) 623, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 352, 17 Jur. 5, 1 Week. Rep. 85, has not, so far as I know, except in one notable instance, been considered by Australasian courts as applicable to the land transfer acts." And he states that the instance referred to, Lange v. Ruwoldt, 6 South Austr. L. R. 75 (1872) 7 South Austr. L. R. 1, was "reversed" in Cuthbertson v. Swan (1877) 11 South Austr. L. R. 102.<sup>46</sup> The court does not refer, although it was cited by counsel, to a decision of the Victoria court in 1885, holding that where one lodged with a bank, as security for a loan, a transfer to herself of title and the certificate of her transferrer, the bank cannot hold against the rights of the transferrer, in which case the Victoria court observed that it would be otherwise if the bank had insisted that the transfer to the borrower should have first been registered.<sup>47</sup> Nor does the court refer to an earlier opinion of a New South Wales

f. Fraud.

1. In general.

For cases on forgery, see infra, subd. IV. g.

<sup>48</sup> It was considered in the opinion of Owen, J., in the lower court, printed in Baker's Creek Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Hack (1894) 15 N. S. W. L. R. 207, that protection from equities does not arise in favor of a transferee until he has registered his transfer.

<sup>49</sup> For example, these provisions in the Victorian act of 1866, No. 301, are as follows: Section "49. Notwithstanding the existence in any other person of any estate or interest, whether derived by grant from her Majesty or otherwise, which but for this act might be held to be paramount, or to have priority, the proprietor of land, or of any estate or interest in land, under the operation of this act, shall, except in case of fraud, hold the same subject to such encumbrances as may be notified on the folium of the Register Book, constituted by the grant or certificate of title, but absolutely free from all other encumbrances whatsoever, except the estate or interest of a proprietor claiming the same land under a prior registered grant or certificate of title, and except as regards any portion of land that may, by wrong description of parcels or boundaries, be included in the grant, certificate of title, or instrument evidencing the title of such proprietor, not being a purchaser for valuable consideration, or deriving from or through such a purchaser. Provided always that the land which shall be included in any certificate of title or registered instrument shall be deemed to be subject to the reservations, exceptions, conditions, and powers (if any) contained in the grant thereof, and to any rights subsisting under any adverse possession of such land, and to any public rights of way and to any easements acquired by enjoyment or user or subsisting over or upon or affecting such land, and to any unpaid rates, and to any license granted by the board of land and works under the 'mining statute 1865,' and also where the possession is not adverse to the interest of any tenant of the land, notwithstanding the same respectively may not be specially notified as encumbrances on such certificate or instrument." (Section 74 of the Victorian act of 1890 is the same except there are inserted after the figures "1865" the words "or Part I. of the mines act 1890." "50. Except in the case of fraud, no person contracting or dealing with, or taking or proposing to take a transfer from, the proprietor of any registered land, lease, mortgage, or charge, shall be required or in L.R.A.1916D.

The statutes generally include in substance (1) a statement of the effect of a certificate of title "except in case of fraud," and (2) a statement that a purchaser of a registered title shall not be affected by notice, etc., "except in case of fraud."<sup>50</sup>

2. Constructive fraud.

Generally speaking, constructive fraud is immaterial under the acts.<sup>50</sup>

any manner concerned to inquire or ascertain the circumstances under or the consideration for which such proprietor, or any previous proprietor thereof, was registered, or to see to the application of any purchase or consideration money, or shall be affected by notice, actual or constructive, of any trust or unregistered interest, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding; and the knowledge that any such trust or unregistered interest is in existence shall not of itself be imputed as fraud." (Section 140 of the Victorian act of 1890 is the same.)

Under the Queensland statute, § 44 makes the estate of a registered proprietor of land, or of any estate or interest in land, paramount, and § 109 provides that a transferee, either voluntary or involuntary, under the various provisions of the act, shall not, except in the case of fraud, be affected by actual or constructive notice of any claims, etc., other than those which have been notified or protected by entry in the registry book. It was held in Conroy v. Knox (Qd.) supra, that these sections do not mean constructive fraud, but actual fraud, but that the provisions of the act giving an indefeasible title "are not to be construed as meaning that, by registration alone under the act, a duly registered proprietor is enabled to get rid of equities residing in himself in relation to such property." The court cited on the last proposition, Hall v. Loder (1885) 7 N. S. W. L. R. (Eq.) 44, and Sempill v. Jarvis, 6 N. S. W. S. C. R. 68; see infra, subd. IV. m.

Section 119 of the New Zealand act of 1870 was the same as § 111 of the New South Wales act of 1862 (26 Vict. No. 9), and was substantially the same as § 189 of the New Zealand act of 1885, and differed but slightly from § 50 of the Victorian act of 1892, above quoted, f, 1, it being as follows: 119. "Except in the case of fraud, no person contracting or dealing with, or taking or proposing to take a transfer from, the registered proprietor of any registered estate or interest, shall be required or in any manner concerned to inquire or ascertain the circumstances in or the consideration for which such registered owner, or any previous registered owner, of the estate or

Applicants.

The statutory provision that the applicant shall declare that he is unaware "of any mortgage, encumbrance or claim affecting the said land, or that any person hath any claim, estate or interest in the said land at law, or in equity, in possession or in expectancy other than is set forth and stated as follows, that is to say," etc., does not mean that the applicant "shall specify every demand, honest or dishonest, well founded or ill founded, which may by possibility at any time be set up in opposition to his title."<sup>2</sup>

In one case where the applicant stated in his application that the land was unoccupied when a part of it was occupied, the appellate court stated that "there seems to have been merely a mistake, and a pardonable one," instead of a case within the statute providing that certificates should be canceled for wilful fraud; but the "mistake" was perhaps due to misdescription.<sup>3</sup> interest in question, is or was registered, or to see to the application of the purchase-money or of any part thereof, or shall be affected by notice, direct or constructive, of any trust or unregistered interest, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding; and the knowledge that any such trust or unregistered interest is in existence shall not of itself be imputed as fraud."

In Assets Co. v. Mere Roihi [1905] A. C. (Eng.) 176 (an appeal from New Zealand), where the court held there was no fraud, it was said: "The fraud which must be proved in order to invalidate the title of a registered purchaser for value, whether he buys from a prior registered owner or from a person claiming under a title certified under the native land acts, must be brought home to the person whose registered title is impeached or to his agents. Fraud by persons from whom he claims does not affect him unless knowledge of it is brought home to him or his agents. The mere fact that he might have found out fraud if he had been more vigilant, and had made further inquiries which he omitted to make, does not of itself prove fraud on his part. But if it be shown that his suspicions were aroused, and that he abstained from making inquiries for fear of learning the truth, the case is very different, and fraud may be properly ascribed to him. A person who presents for registration a document which is forged or has been fraudulently or improperly obtained is not guilty of fraud if he honestly believes it to be a genuine document which can be properly acted upon."

In Strang v. Russell (1906) 24 N. Z. L. R. 916, where it was perhaps obiter, the court said that in order to establish a case of fraud under § 189 of the act, by an intending purchaser, there must be enough to raise an inference of dolus, and mere culpa lata, upon which the doctrine of constructive or equitable fraud is based, is not sufficient. There must be not merely negligence, but bad faith, direct notice of some right, or wilful shutting of the eyes to circumstances which, if looked at in good faith, must necessarily lead to the conclusion that fraud on another was being committed.

So under the Manitoba act which provides that "except in the case of fraud on the part of such person, no person contracting," etc., shall be required, etc., "nor shall any person be affected by notice, direct, implied, or constructive," etc. Shaw v. Bailey (1907) 17 Manitoba L. R. 97, holding that an intending purchaser who hears that there is an outstanding contract of sale for the property, and also has other evidence reasonably good that there is no such outstanding sale, is not guilty of fraud. The court followed Stark v. Stephenson (1891) 7 Manitoba L. R. 381, where it was held that in order to bring abstinence from inquiry within the category of actual notice, there must be wilful abstinence and fraudulent determination not to be informed. The Stark Case, however, seems to have been decided under § 43 of the registry act, which, the court said, required actual notice of the prior instrument.

A certificate will not be invalidated because of the failure of the applicant to state that he had ordered off a trespasser who had suggested some claim to the title and who tried to build a cottage which the applicant had torn down, removing the lumber from the land, although there might come a possible claim by the trespasser. Re Beckett (1894) 15 N. S. W. L. R. 94.

Where the applicant's statement as to no adverse possession was inadvertently wrong as to a small portion of land in adverse but wrongful possession, and the parties have agreed as to their differences, the registrar general has no right to caveat the land on the ground that the certificate was acquired by fraud. Smith v. Registrar General [1909] South Austr. L. R. 1.

So, one who took a lease and registered it was protected against the claim of one in possession under a verbal agreement for a lease from the same lessor, where the lessor told the lessee that the one in possession had no lease, and that his tenancy would be determined at any time, and the lessee in good faith believed the statement, as this did not make "fraud" on the part of the lessee. Kirkpatrick v. Hutchinson (1904) 23 N. Z. L. R. 665, citing Merrie v. McKay (1897) 16 N. Z. L. R. 124.

3. Actual knowledge.

For mere knowledge of a trust, see supra, subd. IV. d.

Actual knowledge by the transferee of an intent to commit fraud will forfeit his right to protection.<sup>4</sup>

Actual knowledge of outstanding rights.

The cases merge imperceptibly from knowledge of fraud to knowledge of outstanding rights. It is the general rule that actual knowledge of outstand-holding that a "pardonable" mistake made by an applicant in his application, to wit, that the land was unoccupied when it was in fact occupied, was not within the statute providing that certificates should be canceled for wilful fraud; consequently, when the plaintiff in ejectment was shown to have made such a mistake in his application, on which his certificate of title had been granted, and the defendant gave evidence that he had been in possession of the land, or a part of it, for fifteen years, and the court decided that the plaintiff had been guilty of fraud in his application and that his certificate was rendered void, and gave judgment for the defendant, the appellate court sent the case back for a new trial, intimating that the defendant's defense of adverse possession might be shown on the new trial.

Thus, actual knowledge of a trust and of the nature of it, with the acceptance of a transfer knowing it to be a breach of the trust, is actual fraud, and the acceptor is not protected. National Bank v. National Mortg. & Agency Co. (N. Z.) supra.

An actual fraud, that is to say, conspiracy to defraud the creditor of one who made a transfer to A without consideration, if known to a transferee of A before paying his purchase money, is not protected by § 50 of the Victorian act of 1866, as this protects constructive notices, but not actual notices. Colonial Bank v. Pie (1880) 6 Vict. L. R. (E.) 186, 1 Austr. L. J. 156, Hunter, Torrens Cases, 122.

In Davis v. Wekey (1871) 3 Vict. Rep. 1, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 350, an injunction was granted preventing a purchaser of a lease from dealing with it pending the trial of the action, on the ground that the purchaser was a party to or aware of fraud committed by his assignor in selling it.

ing rights will forfeit a right of protection against them.<sup>5</sup>

"The principle of notice still exists as it did before the act," and one who at the time of taking a transfer has actual notice that the transferrer has contracted to convey the property to a third party is not protected by the act, but his rights must give way to those of the third party, notwithstanding the provision in the act (§ 37) that "instruments purporting to affect the same estate or interest shall, notwithstanding

Thus, one who procures a certificate knowing another to be the real owner of the land is guilty of fraud, and a new certificate to his executors and trustees is not conclusive against the real owner. Biggs v. McEllister (1880) 14 South Austr. L. R. 86, affirmed in (1883) L. R. 8 App. Cas. (Eng.) 314, 52 L. J. P. C. N. S. 29, 49 L. T. N. S. 86.

So, one who purchases knowing of an outstanding agreement for a lease, under which the tenants are in possession, is not entitled to obtain registration free from the agreement. Millard v. Cowdrey (1896) 14 N. Z. L. R. 12.

Thus, where a registered owner made an agreement for a lease with the plaintiff, who entered, and the property passed in succession to three new registered owners, each having knowledge of the agreement and the plaintiff's possession, the third of such owners could not avoid the agreement for a lease. Merrie v. McKay (1897) 16 N. Z. L. R. 124.

So, where the owner of mortgaged land executed an agreement for a lease not in registerable form, and the tenants entered, and the mortgagee sold the land under the power of sale, expressly subject to the agreement, the purchaser could not defeat an action by the tenants for specific performance of the agreement to execute a lease, by claiming that the agreement was unenforceable and unregistered. Thomson v. Finlay (1886) 5 N. Z. L. R. S. C. 203.

In Crowley v. Bergtheil [1899] A. C. (Eng.) 374, dismissing an appeal from Natal, where the registered proprietor transferred the property, and after his death, the transfer not having been registered, a third party secured from his estate a transfer and registered it, although having facts sufficient to inform him that the possessor of the land represented an outstanding lawful interest different from that of the decedent's estate, such third party was held guilty of dolus malus, and his transfer was any actual or constructive notice, be entitled to priority as between themselves according to the date of registration, and not according to the date of the instrument." <sup>6</sup>

—New South Wales.

In New South Wales, the courts take a different view of the question, holding that actual notice of an outstanding inset aside. The court said that they "cannot find that there is much difference between the Roman-Dutch law, which requires proof of dolus to set aside a later completed purchase in favor of an earlier contract, and the English law relating to similar questions in a locality where the system of registration prevails."

In Syndicat Lyonnais Du Klondyke v. McGrade (1905) 36 Can. S. C. 251, it was held that persons taking a conveyance from one whose certificate of title was stated to be subject to a lis pendens had actual notice of the lis pendens, and therefore must face the charge that their land might be subject to a claim of fraud, or that the transfer to their grantor might be, although the act (applicable to the Yukon Territory) did not provide for the filing and noting of a lis pendens upon the registered title and the registrar had no right to enter it.

If a person takes a lien upon land and registers it, having notice that the land had been previously sold to another, his lien is subject to the outstanding interest. Tasker v. Carrigan (1909) — Sask. L. R. —, 11 West L. R. (Can.) 621.

In Conroy v. Knox, 11 Qd. L. J. 112, it was held that an unregistered mortgage is good against a subsequent registered mortgagee who took with notice, though he claimed to have forgotten the notice, as this forgetfulness could not alter the case. It may be noted that the court pointed out that under the act (§ 60) a mortgage was a security, and not a transfer of the land, and considered that §§ 44 and 109 of the act (referred to supra, subd. IV. b) did not apply to mortgages.

But it should be noted that it was held in King v. Price (1904) 24 N. Z. L. R. 291, where a purchaser from a native's devisee, to which devisee a clear certificate of title had been issued, learned at the time of purchase that the original Crown grant to the testator had a restriction on sale without consent of the governor, that such purchaser's clear certificate was unassailable. (It seems that the question whether the restriction ever had any validity was not decided.)

It may be noted also that where the purchaser of land had notice of an outstanding interest as to part of it, and later gave the owner of such outstanding interest an agreement of sale, it was held that he must execute a proper transfer. The court observed that the act "protects a purchaser of land from all encumbrances and trusts; but it does not absolve him from the obligation of performing an express contract into which he has entered." Cunningham v. Gundry (1876) 2 Vict. L. R. 197, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 161.

In Locher v. Howlett (1894) 13 N. Z. L. R. 584, it was held that a purchaser was not protected under § 189 of the New Zealand statute of 1885, whose contract was made in the knowledge that there was an outstanding equitable interest, viz., a contract for conveyance to another person then in possession, this being apparently before any complete registration of title to the property, although a grant from the Crown to the seller awaited only payment of licenses and fees to the Crown, which were later paid, the grant obtained, and the transfer registered to the purchaser. The action was by the first contractee against the seller, the purchaser, and his mortgagee for specific performance. The court considered that the purchaser knew that he was buying a lawsuit, and said that it may be considered as the settled construction of § 189 of the land transfer act, 1885, "that a purchaser is not affected by knowledge of the mere existence of a trust or unregistered interest, but that he is affected by knowledge that the trust is being broken, or that the owner of the unregistered interest is being improperly deprived of it by the transfer under which the purchaser himself is taking." And after referring to Smith v. Essery (1890) 9 N. Z. L. R. 449 (see supra, subd. IV. d), where the appellate court was equally divided, the court said: "I hold that the purchaser's action must be judged of by considering what, with the knowledge he possessed, it was reasonable that he should believe respecting the good faith of the transaction;" and that where the circumstances should raise a strong suspicion of fraud, the purchaser should go no further without full inquiry. The seller claimed that the first contractee had broken his contract.

Voluntary trustees taking a conveyance with knowledge that the land has already been sold to another person are not protected by subsequently having the land registered, as the procurement of an unqualified certificate of title by suppression veri is a fraud, where the statute provided: "Nothing contained in this act shall take away or affect the jurisdiction of any competent court on the ground of actual fraud, or over contracts for the sale or other disposition of lands, or over equitable interests therein." Fish v. Bryce (1909) 2 Sask. L. R. 111.

In this connection reference may be made to Chapman v. Edwards (1911) 16 B. C. 334, though the case is probably beyond the scope of this note, as the title of the seller to at least a part of the land was unregistered, and as to the other part the report is not clear. It was there held that one with knowledge of an outstanding unregistered contract of purchase cannot, by taking a new contract of purchase of the land from the owner and filing it for registry, dispose of the rights of the holder of the earlier contract, notwithstanding the land registry act (§ 74) provided that no instrument (except those as to certain leasehold interests) "shall pass any estate or interest, either at law or equity, in such land, until the same shall be registered in compliance with the provisions of this act," the court referring with approval to Cowell v. Stacey (1887) 13 Vict. L. R. 80, supra.

<sup>7</sup> Cooke v. Union Bank (1893) 14 N. S. W. L. R. 280, where, after a marriage settlement agreeing to convey certain lands to trustees, the husband registered the lands and borrowed money of a bank, to which he gave the deeds (whether he delivered the certificate also does not appear) and showed the marriage settlement, and it was held that the bank was not affected by notice of the trust.

<sup>8</sup> Oertel v. Hordern 1902) 2 N. S. W. St. Rep. 37, where it was held that one who purchased with actual knowledge of an unregistered lease, which there was possibly some reason to think invalid, can, after registering the transfer to himself, defend against the lessee, who filed no caveat before such registration. The court did not content itself with resting the decision on the ground that the purchaser had only notice of a possible claim which might be invalid, but cited as contrary to its decision the foregoing cases of National Bank v. National Mortg. & Agency Co. 3 N. Z. L. R. S. C. 257; Locher v. Howlett (1894) 13 N. Z. L. R. S. C. 584; Merrie v. McKay (1897) 16 N. Z. L. R. 124, and upon the other side the foregoing cases of Cooke v. Union Bank (N. S. W.) and also the case of Robertson v. Keith (1870) 1 Vict. Rep. 11, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 366. The Robertson Case was decided in favor of the person in possession, but the court did express the opinion that the defeated party was not guilty of fraud in buying with notice of the possessor's rights.

It may be noted that in Josephson v. Mason (1912) 12 N. S. W. St. Rep. 249, the court observed, after quoting § 43 of the act of 1900, No. 25 (which is the same as § 111 of the act of 1862, 26 Vict. No. 5, and as § 119 of the New Zealand act of 1870, quoted supra, subd. IV. 8, 1): "In the cases of Cooke v. Union Bank (N. S. W.) supra, decided by Manning, J., and Oertel v. Hordern (N. S. W.) supra, decided by A. H. Simpson, J., the view taken was that 'fraud' as here used meant actual fraud, as distinguished from what is spoken of as 'constructive' fraud, and this agrees with what was said in the judgment of the privy council in Assets Co. v. Mere Roihi [1905] A. C. (Eng.) 176, with reference to the New Zealand enactments, where it was said, at p. 210, 'By fraud in these acts is meant actual fraud, i. e. dishonesty of some sort, not what is called constructive or equitable L.R.A.1916D.

C. 573; Ogle v. Aedy (1887) 13 Vict. L. R. 461, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 285.

In Independent Lumber Co. v. Gardiner (1910) 3 Sask. L. R. 140, where the registered owner made a deed to an undivided half of his lot, and while this was unregistered made a mortgage of the whole lot to another person, stating to him the circumstances of the earlier transfer, and stating that he owned only one undivided one half, and that the mortgage was not intended to cover more than that, and the mortgagee registered his mortgage and then endeavored to foreclose it, it was held that the mortgagee was guilty of fraud notwithstanding the following provision of the statute: "173. No person contracting or dealing with, or taking or proposing to take, a transfer, mortgage, encumbrance, or lease from the owner of any land for which a certificate of title has been granted, shall, except in case of fraud by such person, be bound or concerned to inquire into or ascertain the circumstances in or the consideration for which the owner or any previous owner of the land is or was registered, or to see to the application of the purchase money or of any part thereof, nor shall he be affected by notice, direct, implied, or constructive, of any trust or unregistered interest in the land, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding. (2) The knowledge that any trust or unregistered interest is in existence shall not of itself be imputed as fraud."

Where an official of a company, taking advantage of a purchaser's clerical mistake, caused the company to convey to such purchaser the wrong lot, and later (it not being clear whether he was still connected with the company or not) procured a conveyance to himself from the company of the lot bargained for by said purchaser, and registered such conveyance, becoming thus the registered owner of the lot, the court compelled him to transfer the lot to the first purchaser, and the company to release a mortgage it had taken thereon from the second purchaser. The court considered that the defendants were not pro-

Thus, one who takes title knowing that his transferrer is defrauding a lessee, and who instigates such fraud, is himself guilty of fraud, under the New Zealand act.<sup>10</sup>

So, a mortgagee whose mortgage by an agreement was an absolute transfer, which he registered, and was by the agreement subject to an unregistered contract of sale, should not be allowed to set up his certificate of title to defeat the holder of such contract.<sup>11</sup>

"So long as the rights of third parties are not implicated a wrongdoer cannot shelter himself under the registration as against the man who has suffered the wrong."<sup>12</sup>

One applying to have land registered for the first time, who conceals a legal fraud in the title committed by himself, is within the section providing that the registered owner, "except in case of fraud," shall hold the land free from all encumbrances, etc., not specified in the register book, as this refers to fraud as understood in courts of equity, and is not limited as is the provision as to fraud in the section as to fraud apart tected by the section providing that every certificate shall (except in case of fraud wherein the owner had participated or concluded) be conclusive evidence of title, with certain exceptions, nor by the further section (135) which is in general similar to § 50 of the Victoria act of 1866, except that in the Alberta act he is not to be affected by notice "direct, implied, or constructive," while the Victoria act reads "actual or constructive." Sydie v. Saskatchewan & B. River Land & Dev. Co. (1913) — Alberta L. R. —, 14 D. L. R. 51, where the court cited Assets Co. v. Mere Rqhi [1905] A. C. (Eng.) 176, 74 L. J. P. C. N. S. 49, 92 L. T. N. S. 397, 21 Times L. R. 311, arising under the similar New Zealand provision, and also said: "The exact interpretation to be placed on the section of the New Zealand act similar to the section before us was discussed by Richmond, J., in National Bank v. National Mortg. & Agency Co. 3 N. Z. L. R. S. C. 257, at pp. 262-264, a case very like the present one. I agree with his remark that it may be an act of downright dishonesty knowingly to accept from the registered owner a transfer of property which he has no right to dispose of. As pointed out in that case, it is enough to say on which side of a possible line of demarcation the case falls, without pretending to draw the actual line."

It may be noted, although it does not appear whether the title was registered until after the mortgage, that it was held that the mortgagee of a registered mortgage will not be protected in advances made thereon after receiving notice from a third party that the land had been obtained from him by fraud, as the making of further advances would be acting in collusion with the mortgagor. Robinson v. Ford (1914) 7 Sask. L. R. 443, 19 D. L. R. 572.

its own arrangements as to certain unregistered interests, the court stating that the case was within the exception in § 7 of the "registration of titles regulation," which provided: "Section 7: The duplicate certificate of title issued by the registrar to any purchaser of land upon a genuine transfer or transmission by the proprietor thereof shall be taken by all courts as conclusive evidence that the person named therein as proprietor of the land is the absolute and indefeasible owner thereof, subject to the conditions and agreements expressed or implied in the original grant, and the title of such proprietor shall not be subject to challenge, except on the ground of fraud or misrepresentation to which he is proved to be a party, or on the ground of adverse possession in another for the prescriptive period."

Where the defendant fraudulently got possession of a transfer to himself of a piece of property, which transfer had never been delivered to him, and registered the transfer, the certificate will be canceled and the transfer set aside. Annable v. Coventry (1912) 46 Can. S. C. 573, dismissing an appeal from Saskatchewan.

The court, it seems, will not dissolve on affidavits an injunction made to restrain the holder of a registered title from dealing with it on the ground that he had been guilty of fraud. Hooper v. Smith (1905) 7 Terr. L. R. (Can.) 27, where the court said: "In Gregory v. Alger (1893) 19 Vict. L. R. 565, 15 Austr. L. T. 22, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 532, it was held by the supreme court of Victoria that, in the absence of fraud on the part of the holder of a certificate of title, his title will prevail over an unregistered interest, even though he had notice of such interest before he obtained his certificate, and that his obtaining the certificate with such notice did not constitute fraud. This was a decision under the Victorian transfer of land act, similar to § 126 of our act, the land titles act, 1894, 57-58 Vict. chap. 28. It appears, however, that the courts of New Zealand have taken a different view of the effect of a similar enactment there. See Duffy v. Howland, p. 285, and Locker v. Howland, Digest of Australian Land Cases, p. 114. The question of the effect of such notice is therefore not free from doubt."

from and outside of knowledge of some existing trust, etc., which applies in cases of land already registered.<sup>13</sup>

5. Rights of bona fide purchasers.

Bona fide takers from one fraudulent-ly registered will be protected.<sup>14</sup>

The bona fide transferee from one whose certificate is founded on a void instrument takes a good title.<sup>15</sup>

But it has been held that he who obtains a first certificate based on a void conveyance is not protected.<sup>16</sup>

The court seems to have misapprehended the situation in Gregory v. Alger (see supra, subd. IV. d), as in that case it did not appear that the mortgagee knew that the situation actually meant that there was an outstanding unregistered interest. For Locher v. Howlett (1894) 13 N. Z. L. R. 584, see supra, subd. IV. f, 3.

One who innocently and in good faith takes a mortgage to secure a prior indebtedness, without knowledge of any fraud on the part of the mortgagor, takes a good title from the mortgagor, he being the registered owner, although the mortgagor acquired his title by deceiving a prior owner into executing, instead of a mortgage, an absolute transfer of the land, by which he had himself registered as the owner, for, while this was a fraud as against the original owner, who was then the registered proprietor, and whose tenant was in possession during all the time, the mortgagee from the person committing the fraud is protected under § 50 of the act. Cullen v. Thompson (1879) 5 Vict. L. R. 147, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 322, where the court said: "The whole policy of the act would be frustrated if 'except in the case of fraud' was held to mean or include fraud of the conveying party in acquiring title. In a recent case of Chomley v. Firebrace, 5 Vict. L. R. 57, Hunter, Torrens Title Cases, 98, the full court held as to a conveyance by a person who was agent of both parties to his conveyance, that his fraud prevented the application of the act; that the fraudulent conveyance was ineffectual. But to decide for the plaintiff in this case against Johnson would be to say that a person innocently taking from another having fraudulently acquired is to be defeated."

A purchaser for value in good faith from one registered will be protected against one defrauded by the vendor, although the purchaser at the time of suit by the person defrauded had not yet registered his transfer. Barnes v. James, 27 Vict. L. R. 749, 8 Argus L. R. (Current Notes) 73.

It seems to be held in the obscurely reported case of Honeybone v. National Bank, L.R.A.1916D.

Notice.

One lending money to an unregistered transferee, with notice that the transferor has a claim, will be second to such claim, although it would be otherwise without such notice.<sup>17</sup>

One not a bona fide purchaser.

It has been held that one not a bona fide purchaser will not be protected.<sup>18</sup>

Specific performance.

R. 102, that if a debtor, instead of giving his creditor a mortgage, gives him an absolute transfer under a promise not to register it, and the creditor breaks the promise, registers the transfer, and mortgages the property to a third party, the mortgagee, who does not at once register the mortgage, will not be prevented from doing so after the debtor has settled with his creditor in ignorance of the mortgage.

St. Rep. 639 (see supra), where there were two unregistered mortgages to two successive and independent mortgagees, and before the second mortgage money was advanced, a caveat was lodged by a solicitor for the true owner, stating that the purchase money had not been paid, and during the course of the negotiations for the second mortgage, the solicitor withdrew the caveat although the purchase money had not been paid, and the second mortgagee thereupon advanced his money, although he knew that the solicitor acted for the transferee as well as the true owner.

Section 50 of the Victorian act does not apply in the case of a person who takes with constructive notice of a trust, and who at the time he acquires his interest pays no consideration. Crow v. Campbell (Austr.) supra.

A registered holder, A, having been induced by fraud to execute a transfer to B, who transferred to C, who transferred to D, none of the transfers being registered, it was held in an action by A against B, C and D, that, the transfer to B being shown to be fraudulent on B's part, and it not being shown that C and D were bona fide purchasers for value, all the transfers must be canceled. McInnis v. Getsman (Sask.) supra.

purchase property from a registered owner who is really a mortgagee, and having made such contract and paid part of the money down, is informed of the rights of the mortgagor and of his creditor, he will only be protected to the extent of the money which he paid before he had notice of those rights; but it may be that the court's decision was affected by the fact that the payment was only of $55 on a purchase price of $9,800.<sup>19</sup>

But the same court held shortly afterwards that a purchaser in good faith from a registered owner, having paid part of his consideration, is entitled to have his contract carried out without reference to the fact that there may be anterior fraud; however the judgment was afterwards set aside on the ground that there was an interested person who had not been made a party.<sup>20</sup>

G. Miscellaneous.

Fraud by agent.

Fraud committed by an agent cannot benefit his principal.<sup>21</sup>

Thus, where a trustee took a mortgage in his own name registered under the transfer of land statute, and without the payment of any new consideration transferred the mortgage to the trustees of a different estate, under whom he had power of attorney to invest money, and died, it was held that his successors in trust might have such mortgage re-assigned to them, as the fraud committed by him as agent could not benefit his principal.<sup>22</sup>

Statutes of Elizabeth.

It has been held that the transfer of land act did not do away with the statutes of Elizabeth against fraudulent conveyances, etc.

Thus, a gift by a father to his son, of land registered in the son's name under the transfer of land act, will be of no effect against a subsequent contract made by the father to sell the land to a third person, although the third person is aware of the son's interest, and the father will be compelled to a specific performance of his contract, and so the act has not in this respect altered the statute of 27 Elizabeth, chap. 4, for the protection of purchasers.<sup>23</sup>

In this connection it should be noted that it has been held that the statute 13 Elizabeth chap. 5, has not been done away with by the land registry act of British Columbia.<sup>24</sup>

In Wolfson v. Oldfield (1911) 22 Manitoba L. R. 159, 18 West L. R. (Can.) 449, where an agent acted both for the buyer and the seller, unknown to the seller, and a fraud was committed on the seller, the seller was held entitled to recover the premises from the buyer. It was claimed on the part of the buyer that he was an innocent party, and that therefore he was protected by the land title act, and that the fraud referred to in the act meant only actual fraud, but the court held that there was improper conduct on the part of the agent in bringing about the purchase. The court quoted § 71 of the act giving the right to any person "to show fraud wherein the registered owner, mortgagee, or encumbrancee has participated or colluded, and as against such registered owner, mortgagee, or encumbrancee," also § 76 of the act (in part, viz.): "No action of ejectment . . . shall lie or be sustained against the registered owner . . . except in the following cases, that is to say: The case of a person deprived of any land by fraud, as against the person registered as owner

It was held that the plaintiff was not protected by § 43, subsection 4, of the land registry act (British Columbia), providing that unregistered titles are of no effect as against the purchaser for valuable consideration of such real estate; nor was he protected by § 43, subsection 7, providing that the purchaser for valuable consideration of registered real estate shall not be affected by any notice, expressed, implied, or constructive, of any unregistered title, etc., other than a leasehold interest in possession for a term not exceeding three

Other miscellaneous cases on fraud are referred to in the notes.<sup>25</sup>

g. Forgery.

It is the general rule under the statutes that the immediate taker of a forged instrument, though innocent, is not protected, but that, after the forged instrument has been registered, a transferee of such registered title will, if a bona fide purchaser, take a good title.

Immediate innocent takers.

As stated above, the immediate taker of a forged instrument, though innocent, is not protected.<sup>26</sup>

It will be seen that the New Zealand decision to the contrary in Coleman v.

man v. Riria Puwhanga (1886) 4 N. Z. S. C. 230, infra. Thus, one who, in good faith, takes a forged transfer and registers it, obtains nothing. Re Adams (1914) — Alberta L. R. —, 20 D. L. R. 293. So, where a person in good faith procures a forged instrument to be registered for which he has given value to the forger, he will be compelled to give up the instrument in order that the registration may be canceled, as title only passes by the registration of a valid instrument (but a bona fide purchaser from one registered under a void instrument would be protected). Ex parte District Land Registrar (Ex parte Davy) (1888) 6 N. Z. L. R. 760. For the circumstances in Atty. Gen. v. Odell, see infra, subd. IV. 1.

<sup>25</sup> Reference may be made in this connection to Brady v. Brady (1874) 8 South Austr. L. R. 219, holding that a certificate and a mortgage were nullities where a son, fraudulently suppressing the will of his late father, applied in his father's name to have land brought under the act, stating that the only claim affecting the land was that he had agreed to execute a mortgage to K. for £250, money borrowed on the security of the land. The certificate was issued in the father's name, and the same day the son in such name mortgaged the property for £250 to D, who was, said the court, probably the principal of K. The act provided for issuing a certificate in the name of a decedent only where he died after application.

It may be noted that in Turner v. Clark (1909) 2 Sask. L. R. 200, where the registered owner gave a power of attorney to his wife to transfer land, and she transferred the land, giving the transferee the duplicate certificate of title, and the registrar refused to transfer the title because he did not have the power of attorney, a subsequent transferee from the registered owner filed a caveat, and, suppressing the facts, obtained an order for the registry of his title without the duplicate certificate, but that this was set aside, the court concluding that the subsequent transferee, if not acting fraudulently, had acted in collusion with the husband.

So, where a person in good faith procures a forged instrument to be registered for which he has given value to the forger, he will be compelled to give up the instrument in order that the registration may be canceled, as title only passes by the registration of a valid instrument (but a bona fide purchaser from one registered under a void instrument would be protected). Ex parte District Land Registrar (Ex parte Davy) (1888) 6 N. In Kay v. Barnett [1909] St. R. Qd. (W. N.) 39, the defendant, claiming under a forged mortgage from the registered proprietors, was held not entitled to relief (when the plaintiffs sued for their title deed) on the ground that the forgery was rendered possible by the proprietors' negligence, as the court would not interfere unless the degree of negligence proved was "negligence so gross as to be tantamount to fraud;" and the court considered that there was here not even carelessness or improvidence. It is suggested that the fraud was committed by a conveyancer with whom the plaintiffs left their papers, and a conveyancer (said the court) "is an official of the court."

See, also, in this connection, Oelkers v. Merry (1872) 2 Qd. S. C. 193, where an owner having a certificate mortgaged the property, and the mortgagee's executor, on default of principal and interest, brought ejectment against the holder of a subsequent certificate as to part of the land, who brought this part under the act after purchase from a stranger; it was held the plaintiff could recover, but that it would have been otherwise if the stranger had had a certificate, the defendant being a bona fide purchaser for value.

The decision contrary to the text in O'Connor v. O'Connor (1887) 9 Austr. L. T. 117, followed the decision of the full court in Messer v. Gibbs (1887) 13 Vict. L. R. 854, 9 Austr. L. It was held in the O'Connor Case that a registered proprietor who is a purchaser for value, without notice, obtains an indefeasible title although the instrument by which he obtained his registration

Fictitious proprietor.

In accordance with the foregoing principle it has been held that one who forges a transfer to a fictitious person, has the title registered in the name of such fictitious person, and then makes a mortgage in the name of the fictitious person to a bona fide mortgagee, has not done anything whereby the bona fide mortgagee can be protected in his mortgage as against the original registered owner, whose name has been forged.<sup>30</sup>

<sup>27</sup> (1886) 4 N. Z. S. C. 230. In that case the testator in his lifetime had obtained a certificate of title, and it was claimed that a deed of conveyance of a part of the land was forged, but there was no proof that the testator or his agents were aware of the forgery. It was held that his title was good and that that of his devisees (who obtained a certificate) was good. (Apparently we are to understand that the deed claimed to be forged was to the testator.)

h. Misdescription.

One of the most difficult matters under the Torrens acts is that of misdescription of land in a certificate, and the cases have not gone far toward solving the difficulties. The acts generally, in providing for the conclusiveness of the certificate, except rights under an earlier certificate of another proprietor, and most of them also except land included by wrong description in the certificate of one not being a purchaser for a valuable consideration, or deriving title through such a purchaser.

The earlier certificate, in general, prevails;<sup>34</sup> but this rule is not invariable.<sup>35</sup>

An error in description or boundaries cannot be relied upon to displace a good title of a person in possession.<sup>36</sup>

But it has been held that an original misdescription will be protected in the hands of a bona fide certificate holder for value, without fraud, notwithstanding an outstanding possession of the disputed strip, which was for less than the statutory period at the time of trial.<sup>37</sup>

Where there is no misdescription, but a certificate includes a plainly described tract to which it is claimed there was no title in the registered proprietor, the statute as to misdescription does not apply, and the certificate is conclusive.<sup>38</sup>

And it has been held that after registration there cannot be correction of the mistake where one agreeing to sell lands to two different parties substituted one lot in the transfer to A, which was meant for B, and vice versa.<sup>39</sup>

Errors in survey or misdescription will be corrected when there has been no bona fide sale;<sup>40</sup> and a transferee is not

Where A sold part of his land to B, who got a proper certificate, and later A sold the remainder to D, whose certificate, through error, described both pieces, and D transferred this certificate to E, a bona fide purchaser, who took a new certificate with the same error, all parties acting in good faith, it was held that E must deliver up his certificate for correction. *Registrar of Titles v. <sup>36</sup> Overland v. Lenehan (1901) 11 Qd. L. J. 59, where the court construed § 44 of the real property act of 1861, declaring the estate of a registered proprietor to be paramount except in certain cases, one of which is "the wrong description of the land or its boundaries," and held that an error in description of boundaries cannot be relied upon to displace the title, otherwise good, of a person in possession of land erroneously included in the title. The court considered that the plaintiffs, who claimed under the earlier certificate, had such land as was marked out on the ground when their predecessor acquired title, but that his certificate erroneously included part of the land correctly described in the defendant's certificate; and held further that (while it was not considered material) any right of action in the plaintiffs accrued more than twenty years before suit.

others who later got a certificate for the land bought by the first purchaser cannot oust his possession, it having been long enough to make a title. Lake v. Jones (1889) 15 Vict. L. R. 728.

It has been held that one claiming under a possessory title may not have relief in equity on the ground of mistaken boundaries in a certificate of an adjoining owner, as he may sufficiently show possession at law. Rourke v. Schweikert (1888) 9 N. S. W. L. R. 152.

C. 15, where, by mistake one agreeing to sell various lots to two different parties substituted one lot in the transfer to A which was meant for B, and vice versa, it was held that the mistake could not be corrected after registration, as the case was not within the exceptions to § 129 of the act of 1870, providing that "no action for possession or other action for the recovery of any land shall lie or be sustained against the registered proprietor under the provisions of this act for the estate or interest in respect to which he is so registered except in any of the following cases [that is to say] . . . subsection 4. The case of a person deprived of any land by fraud as against the person registered as proprietor of such land through fraud or as against a person deriving otherwise than as a transferee bona fide for value from or through a person so registered through fraud."

protected where he took with notice of the mistake, or with means of knowledge that it was a mistake.<sup>41</sup>

4. Easements.

(Questions of dedication of highways are not considered.)

Under the Victorian act of 1866,<sup>42</sup> it was held that an easement over upon or affecting land which had not been brought under the act could not be registered under such act.<sup>43</sup> After this decision the act was amended to the effect that a statement of an easement on the certificate of the dominant tenement should be conclusive evidence.<sup>44</sup> There-

The 33d section of the New South Wales act 26 of Vict. 9 (1862), making the certificate conclusive, is to be read in connection with § 40, providing an exception: "So far as regards any portion of land that may by wrong description of parcels or of boundaries be included in the grant, certificate," etc., "evidencing the title of such registered proprietor, not being a purchaser or mortgagee for value, or deriving from or through a purchaser or mortgagee thereof for value." Marsden v. McAllister (1887) 8 N. S. W. L. R. 300.

Where one by a misdescription in the transfer obtains a certificate of title covering a lot in addition to what he bought, his certificate as to such lot will be canceled, the court considering it gross fraud for such transferee to resist the claim of the plaintiff, the real owner of such lot, who was a prior grantee of the same grantor. Ott v. Lethbridge Brewing & Malting Co. (1910) 3 Alberta L. R. 210. In that case, at the time of the plaintiff's purchase her vendor had not registered the transfer to him, and later, by misdescription, included her lot in a transfer to the defendant, who obtained a certificate including it. The court pointed out that the conclusiveness of the certificate is not for all purposes, but for the purposes of the act, and said: "The purpose, then, for which the act declares the conclusiveness of the certificate of ownership, is the protection of persons dealing with the certificate owner."

But it may be noted in this connection that where one who owned two adjoining pieces by separate registered titles erected buildings and sold by the old descriptions to different persons, one of the buildings encroaching on the other land, it was held that his grantee was not obliged to remove the encroachment at the suit of a bona fide transferee from the grantee of the other parcel. Billiet v. Commercial Bank [1906] South Austr. L. R. 193.

<sup>42</sup> It was provided in the Victoria statutes in § 4 of act No. 301 of 1866, and also in § 4 of the act of 1890, that the word "land" shall include messuages tenements and hereditaments corporeal or incorporeal; and in every certificate of title transfer and lease issued or made under this act such word shall also include all easements and appurtenances appertaining to the land therein described or reputed to be part thereof or appurtenant thereto." It was also provided by § 49 of No. 301 that the land "included in a certificate of title or registered instrument shall be deemed to be subject to . . . any easements acquired by enjoyment or user or subsisting over or upon or affecting such land." And by § 64 of said act No. 301, that "a memorial of any transfer or lease creating any easement over or upon or affecting any land under the operation of this act shall be entered upon the folium of the register book constituted by the grant or existing certificate of title of such land in addition to any other entry concerning such instrument required by this act."

<sup>44</sup> Act No. 610 of 1878, providing: "Section 2. Whenever any certificate of title or any duplicate thereof, either already registered or issued, or hereafter to be registered or issued, under any of the provisions or otherwise under the operation of the 'transfer of land statute,' shall contain any statement to the effect that the person named in the certificate is entitled to any easement therein specified, such statement shall be received in all courts of law and equity as conclusive evidence that he is so entitled."

after it was held that the owner of the servient tenement could not deny an easement shown on both certificates,<sup>45</sup> and also that one claiming an easement over registered land might have his own land registered with the easement set out, and that the court could not review the action of the registrar in deciding against the owner of the servient tenement.<sup>46</sup>

Although it was required by a later act that the registrar should specify upon the certificate as an encumbrance any subsisting easement affecting the same which should appear to have been created by deed or writing,<sup>47</sup> it was held that the failure of the registrar to enter on the certificate of the servient tenement an easement granted by deed before the transfer of land acts did not prevent the owner of the dominant tenement from showing that such easement exists, as the provision of the earlier statute that land included in a certificate shall be deemed to be subject to any easement subsisting over it had not been interfered with by subsequent legislation.<sup>48</sup>

A grant of way in gross is not an easement, and therefore is not to be registered as such.<sup>49</sup>

It has been held in South Australia that a clean certificate is subject to an existing right of way under the exception, "except so far as regards the omission or misdescription of any right of way or other easement created in or existing upon any land," the court also considering that it was not the purpose of the act to affect easements.<sup>50</sup>

It has also been held that a certificate of title of the dominant tenement, describing also easements of rights of way, is no evidence of the easements.<sup>1</sup>

But it has also been held that in an application to bring lands under the act, on a caveat by another, claiming an easement, which is not disputed, the court may direct the easement to be entered upon the certificate.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>48</sup> Stevenson v. James (1889) 15 Vict. L. R. 615, appeal dismissed in [1893] A. C. (Eng.) 162, where the court said: "The 49th section of the transfer of land statute provides that land included in any certificate of title shall be deemed to be subject to any easement subsisting over it. The subsequent legislation on the subject has not, in their lordships' judgment, interfered with this provision. The amending act, No. 610, by § 2, makes a certificate of title, which certifies that the person named therein is entitled to an easement, conclusive evidence that he is so entitled; but it does not make such certificate the only evidence admissible. The 41st section of the subsequent amending act, No. 872, requires the registrar to specify upon the certificate as an encumbrance affecting the land included in it any substanting easement affecting the same which shall appear to have been created by deed or writing; but their lordships agree with the judgment of the full court of Victoria, that 'the omission by the registrar to enter the easement as an encumbrance on the certificate of the servient tenement under this provision would not relieve the servient tenement of its liability.' In like manner the omission of the registrar to state on the certificates granted to the plaintiffs the existence of the rights of way they claim is no bar to that claim."

L. R. 199. The court said: "Yet, if it were held that 'rights of way or other easements' were not such 'interests in the land' as entitled the owner to enter a caveat in respect of them, they might, if created by express grant since the passing of the real property amendment act of 1878 (No. 128) be altogether extinguished by omissions from the certificate of title which their owner would be powerless to prevent (see § 60). . . . This application, it must be observed, is not one to set the caveat aside, but is on the caveator's own petition in support of the caveat, and we think we have jurisdiction under § 48

It has been held in New South Wales that if a right of way is shown by an owner of unregistered land over land about to be registered, the easement should be entered on the certificate of the servient tenement;<sup>3</sup> and the view has been expressed there that one claiming an easement may file a caveat.<sup>4</sup>

It has been held under the New Zealand act of 1885 that after land has become subject to the acts either of 1870 or of 1885, no easements can be acquired by user;<sup>5</sup> and that, in order to create an easement, the instrument must purport to create one, and a memorial must be entered on the title of the servient tenement before any right passes; and the statute also provides that a memorial of it is to be entered on the title of the dominant tenement;<sup>6</sup> and further, that an unregistered easement is of no effect against one who takes title even with notice of it.<sup>7</sup>

j. Covenants.

A covenant which is not an interest in the land need not be registered.<sup>8</sup>

It has been held under the English acts that placing upon the register notice of covenants or conditions does not annex them to the land.<sup>9</sup>

An unregistered restrictive covenant is of no effect against one without notice of it.<sup>10</sup>

It has been held in Saskatchewan that the seller could not thereafter have a of the act of 1878, to direct 'such entries' upon the certificate and the register as justice requires. . . . Though easements are protected when omitted or misdescribed (subject to the provisions of § 60 of the act of 1878), they should be mentioned upon the certificate of title of the land subject to them; at least, when their existence is, as in this case, admitted."

In the New South Wales statute of 1862, 26 Vict. 9, it is provided: "43. Whenever any easement or any incorporeal right other than an annuity or rent charge in or over any land under the provisions of this act is created for the purpose of being annexed to or used and enjoyed together with other land under the provisions of this act the registrar general shall enter a memorial of the instrument creating such easement or incorporeal right upon the folium of the Register Book constituted by the existing grant or certificate of title of such other land."

And by § 57 it is enacted: 'After land has become subject to this act no title thereto or to any right, privilege, or easement in, upon, or over the same shall be acquired by possession or user adversely to or in derogation of the title of the registered proprietor;'" the court pointing out the distinction in § 49 of the Victoria statute.

<sup>8</sup> Staples v. Corby (1900) 19 N. Z. L. R. 517, holding that upon an application to register land for the first time the ownership of a hotel is none the less a fee simple vested in possession under the statute, although the owner is subject to a certain restriction not to purchase any colonial ale, etc., which might be consumed therein except from a certain company, and the company has no interest in the land, nor is the covenant a trust, and such covenant should not be entered upon the certificate.

In International Coal & C. Co. v. Trelle (1907) 1 Alberta L. R. 170, 7 West. L. R. (Can.) 264, however, it appears that a covenant by a purchaser not to sell intoxicating liquors was referred to on his certificate of title.

Jo. 269, where a purchaser of land under a deed with restrictive covenants afterwards registered himself as the owner, but without the restrictive covenants. He then conveyed a part of the land by deeds containing similar covenants and other covenants, and later had covenants similar to those under which he took the premises noted on the register, and thereafter sold another part of the premises with similar restrictions in the deed. It was held that the first purchaser could not compel the second purchaser to carry out the covenant in his deed, as placing notice of the covenants or conditions upon the register did not annex them to the land.

restrictive covenant entered upon the buyer's title as an easement, as under the act any easement was ineffective as not registered in the manner prescribed by the statute.<sup>11</sup>

The registrar may not decline to register the title of an applicant on the ground that he is not shown to have "a good safeholding and marketable title," in that the conveyance did not contain the usual covenants for title.<sup>12</sup>

A transferrer does not guarantee that he will not afterwards buy an outstanding title for his own benefit, where, under the statute, the transfer purports to convey "all his estate and interest in said piece of land," without saying what that interest consists of.<sup>13</sup>

In the insufficiently reported case of Richard v. Jones (1865) 1 South Austr. L. R. 167, it was held that an equitable lien was created by the deposit of the certificate of title.

Where one who procured a certificate deposited it as security for an advance, and thereafter the court held that another person should be registered, the court will not cancel the first registration until the equitable mortgagee, who was an innocent person, has been satisfied. Ex parte Patterson (1873) 4 Austr. gages and executions, etc., or insolvent assignments, are not included. The difficulty of changing an old system of conveyancing is illustrated by the effect of the English practice of borrowing upon the deposit of title deeds, upon the Torrens law, it being natural for registered owners familiar with the old practice to borrow money on deposit of the certificate of title with the creditor. The courts, as far as possible, will support equitable mortgages of this kind, which are not considered inconsistent with the acts.<sup>14</sup>

A mortgage by deposit of certificate is good as against a subsequent unregistered mortgage.<sup>15</sup> (In some jurisdictions equitable mortgages are expressly authorized.)<sup>16</sup>

In Acme Co. v. Huxley (1912) 4 Alberta L. R. 63, 1 D. L. R. 860, a wife, being the registered owner of property, delivered a transfer thereof to her husband, she retaining the certificates of title. Her husband delivered this transfer to his creditor as collateral security, and thereafter made a settlement with his creditor, giving him a transfer of the land,—that is to say, a transfer from the husband to the creditor; and upon an application by the creditor to compel the wife to deliver up her certificate of title, the court below held that the plaintiff must recover. An appeal was dismissed on an equal division of the judges, those in favor of the plaintiff holding that the wife had in effect represented by what she had done that the husband was entitled to deal with the property as his own, and the plaintiff having relied upon that, she could not, to his prejudice, be permitted to deny it; while the opposing members of the court seemed to consider that the plaintiff was not in any sense a bona fide purchaser, and that the deposit by the husband with the creditor of a transfer from the wife to the husband was not in any sense a deposit of any title deed, and that the husband had no legal or equitable estate which could be pledged in any such manner.

"the instrument of title" is ahead of a prior unregistered bill of sale of the right to cut timber.<sup>17</sup>

It has been held in a case in Victoria that where one lodged with a bank, as security for a loan, a transfer to herself of title and the certificate of her transferrer, the bank cannot hold against the rights of the transferrer;<sup>18</sup> but the contrary has been recently held by the high court of Australia in a New South Wales case, as heretofore stated in subd. e, supra.<sup>19</sup>

It has been held under the British Columbia act that one who claimed as equitable mortgagee by the deposit of title deeds (of one registered as the owner of an absolute, as distinguished from an indefeasible, title) did not have priority over a purchaser for a valuable consideration, who, without actual fraud or express notice of the equitable mortgage, took a conveyance unaccompanied by delivery of title deeds and without a certificate, and registered it as a "charge," the registrar having registered the transfer without the certificate.<sup>20</sup>

For claims of equitable mortgagees against the assurance fund, see next subdivision.

1. Claims against assurance fund.

Claims against the assurance fund on account of mistakes as to caveats, etc., are not included. The expression used hereunder, "action against the assurance fund," means, of course, action against the proper officer.

The general theory as to the assurance fund is that it is to indemnify those who have been deprived of land or interests therein through fraud or mistake, including mistakes of the registrar, and who have no other remedy.

The deprivation of a person of his land, whether by bringing it under the act or by the registration of transfers, is intended to be compensated for by the assurance fund.<sup>21</sup>

Recoveries against the fund have been sustained by those whose lands were unlawfully mortgaged;<sup>22</sup> by trustees of those whose rights under a settlement prior to the act were disregarded in is-

<sup>17</sup> Connolly v. Noone & C. Timber [1912] St. R. Qd. 70, where the registered owner gave a bill of sale of the right to cut timber to A, and later deposited the deed of the land, which the court calls "the instrument of title," as an equitable mortgage, and a caveat was filed by the equitable mortgagee, who had no notice of the bill of sale, and it was held that he was ahead of it. The court said: "Section 30 of the act of 1877 enacts and declares that an equitable mortgage . . . upon land . . . may be created by the deposit of the instrument of title, and such deposit shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, have the same effect on the estate, interest, or security sought to be charged as a deposit of title deeds would have had before the passing of this act."

Where one of the sons of an intestate fraudulently represented himself as the owner of land, and obtained a certificate of title, and mortgaged the land, and the mortgage was foreclosed, the widow of the intestate, having taken out letters of administration, was allowed the value of the land from the assurance fund. Anderson v. Davy (1882) 1 N. Z. S. C. 302.

Where a certificate issued to a devisee, and the will was later set aside, and the devisee had mortgaged the land, and had been adjudicated insolvent, the person deprived of the land might recover from the assurance fund the amount of the mortgage, the land being worth more. Queensland Trustees v. Registrar of Titles (1893) 5 Qd. L. J. 46.

One whose land had been unlawfully mortgaged to a bona fide mortgagee for value is "deprived of the land pro tanto" under § 126 of the Queensland act, and, possibly, said the court, the diminished right of enjoyment may be held to be "deprivation of an 'interest' in the land" under § 126. and so the deprived party may have recourse against the assurance fund where the depriving party cannot pay, but a remainderman's action, it seems, is premature, considered merely as an action for damages. Finucane v. Registrar of Titles [1902] St. R. Qd. 75. Section 126, supra, provided: "Any person deprived of any land or any estate or interest in land in consequence of fraud or in consequence of the issue of a certificate of title to any suing a certificate of title;<sup>23</sup> by cestuis que trustent of a charge where their trustees were barred and they were not;<sup>24</sup> and by an equitable mortgagee with whom a certificate was deposited, where the owner, on claiming that he had lost his certificate, obtained another and sold the land to a purchaser in good faith whose transfer was registered.<sup>25</sup>

But it has been held that a creditor may not have recourse on the assurance fund as "deprived of land" or of an "estate or interest in land," where the registrar failed to indorse on the last material registered document a mem. that the land had been brought under the statute, and the owner later procured a loan by deposit of the deeds, the creditor supposing the land not to be registered.<sup>26</sup>

But it is not necessary that one who made a loan in ignorance of a mortgage which the registrar had omitted to enter on the certificate (and which had been held prior to the loan) should show that he was deprived of land or of any estate or interest therein by the omission, where the statute in substance permits an action by any person sustaining loss through such omission, and by any person deprived of land.<sup>27</sup>

Recoveries have also been sustained against the fund where the registrar has other person or in consequence of any entry in the Registrar Book or of any error or omission in any certificate of title or in any entry in the Register Book may bring and prosecute an action at law in the supreme court for the recovery of damages against the person who derived benefit by such fraud or in consequence of the issue of such certificate of title or by such entry or in consequence of such error or omission. (Can.) 253, where it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recourse against the assurance fund where the register had omitted to enter a memorial of a mortgage upon the certificate of title, although it had been filed and entered in the day book, and the plaintiff, not knowing there was this mortgage, made a loan upon the property, which was afterwards held subsequent in part to the omitted mortgage, and that it was not necessary that the plaintiff, in order to recover, should show that he was deprived of land or of any estate or interest therein by the mistake or omission, where the statute provided that "any person sustaining loss or damage through any omission, mistake or misfeasance of the registrar, or any of his officers or clerks, in the execution of their respective duties under the provisions of this act, and any person deprived of any land or of any estate or interest in land by the registration of any other person as owner of such land, or by any error, omission or misdescription in any certificate of title, or in any entry or memorial in the register, and who, by the provisions of this act is barred from bringing an action of ejectment, or other action for the recovery of such land, estate or interest, may, in any case in which the remedy by action for recovery of damages . . . is barred, bring an action against the registrar as nominal defendant, for recovery of damages. . . ." The court considered that the words "and who, by the provisions of this act," etc., referred merely to persons deprived of land or of an estate or interest therein, and did not refer to persons sustaining loss or damage through any omission, etc., and pointed out that the act construed in Oakden v. Gibbs (Vict.) supra, was different, and stated that he had to some extent adopted the construction of the dissenting opinion in that case as more reasonable. As to part of his loan, the plaintiff was ahead of the omitted mortgage, being as to such part subrogated to the rights of a prior mortgagee whose mortgage was paid off with the plaintiff's money.

omitted to register a mortgage,<sup>28</sup> a lien,<sup>29</sup> or an execution.<sup>30</sup>

So, a recovery was sustained by a transferee of a registered lease, which, by mistake of the lessor and of the registrar, included land not owned by the lessor.<sup>31</sup>

But a recovery will not lie against the assurance fund by a purchaser on account of deficiency of acreage where the title as registered contains a description of the property as well as a statement of the acreage.<sup>32</sup>

A recovery will not lie against the assurance fund upon the ground that the registrar had refused to enter upon the certificate an instrument which was not registerable under the act.<sup>33</sup>

Forgery.

The opinion has been expressed that the recourse of a registered owner is against the assurance fund for the amount of a mortgage (and such owner's expenses) to a bona fide registered mortgagee, given by a forger who had first forged a transfer from the true owner to himself, and had it registered.<sup>34</sup>

<sup>28</sup> Wells v. Registrar-General (1909) 29 N. Z. 101, where the registrar, through mistake, issued a certificate omitting to place a mortgage thereon, whereby the mortgage was lost as against a purchaser for value, and the mortgagee and the surety of the mortgagor jointly recovered.

Reference may be made in this connection to Hall v. Registrar of Land Titles (1911) 4 Sask. L. R. 244, 16 West. L. Rep. (Can.) 568, where a mortgage was sent to the registrar at a time when it was not entitled to registration, by reason of the fact that no patent or certificate of title had been issued, and thereafter the patent and certificate of title were issued, and later a third party obtained a mortgage from the original mortgagor, which was registered, and thereafter, upon request, the registrar registered the original mortgage, it was held (that it had no priority, as it was left or remained in the registrar's hands simply as an individual, he not having had any authority as an official to receive it when it was sent to him, and) that the registrar was not liable in damages to the original mortgagee. It was also held in the same case that the fact that the registrar returned the mortgage when he had registered it with an abstract of title which did not show the other mortgage had caused no damage to the holder except that it appeared that such holder paid the mortgagor a small amount due him for services which he otherwise would have credited upon the mortgage, and that recovery should be limited to that amount.

(Can.) 469, holding that one who purchases land on the assurance of a certificate of title issued by the registrar that the property is free and clear is entitled to recover from the assurance fund the expense of paying off seed grain liens which the registrar had omitted to register, and it is not necessary to make a special search for seed grain liens, as the statute requires such liens to be entered upon the register and upon the duplicate certificates.

subsequently issued to the execution debtor and his transferee.

<sup>31</sup> Where a lease was registered which, by mistake of the lessor and of the registrar, included land not owned by the lessor, a transferee of the lease is entitled to damages from the assurance fund although he relied solely on the certificate of registration indorsed on the lease, and did not examine the register. Russell v. Registrar-General (1906) 26 N. Z. L. R. 1223, where Stout, Ch. J., said of § 178 of the N. Z. land transfer act of 1885: "Section 178 contemplates two things: (a) A person 'sustaining loss or damages through any omission, mistake, or misfeasance of any registrar, or any of his officers or clerks, in the execution of their respective duties;' and (b) a person dispossessed of any land, or of any estate or interest in land, through (1) bringing land under the act, (2) the registration of any other person as proprietor, (3) any error, omission, or misdescription in any certificate of title, or in any entry or memorial on the register, or (4) the wrongful inclusion of land in any certificate of title, etc."

But it has been held under the English act that the taker in good faith, for value, from the forger, of a forged instrument, who registers the same, is not entitled to indemnity, as he is not a person "suffering loss by the rectification" of the register, which was done on the application of the person whose name had been forged,<sup>35</sup> a decision with which it is not easy to be reconciled.

One cannot recover of the assurance fund as a person wrongfully deprived of land, on the theory that the transfer from her was obtained by fraud, in that the consideration was worthless, although the transfer from her transferee had been by means of forgery, through which the land eventually was registered in the hands of a bona fide holder.<sup>36</sup>

Remedies and diligence.

An action will not, in general, lie against the assurance fund if the person deprived has another remedy,<sup>37</sup> or if he has been negligent.<sup>38</sup>

Limitations.

It seems that the statute begins to run in favor of the fund when the plaintiff is deprived, although he may not know of it.<sup>39</sup> In case of a remainderman it has been held that the cause of action accrued at the time of the death of the life tenant,<sup>40</sup> and that therefore

<sup>35</sup> In Atty. Gen. v. Odell [1906] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 47, the holder of a mortgage was registered as such, and her attorney forged a transfer by her to a third person, and collected the money from the third person, who delivered the transfer into the registration office and was registered; thereafter, on the application of the rightful mortgagee, the registration was corrected so as to remove the forged instrument, and it was held that the person who had been defrauded was not entitled to indemnity, the court seeming to admit that he could have transferred a title which would have been good, but that he himself could not be indemnified, considering that he was not a person "suffering loss by the rectification of the register under the statute providing that 'where the register is rectified under the principal act by reason of fraud or mistake which has occurred' in a registered disposition for valuable consideration, and which the grantee was not aware of, and could not by the exercise of reasonable care have discovered, the person suffering loss by the rectification shall likewise be entitled to indemnity under this section."

<sup>36</sup> Fawkes v. Atty. General (1903) 6 Ont. L. Rep. 490, where it was held that the plaintiff could not recover from the assurance fund as a person wrongfully "deprived" of land, where the circumstances were that she transferred her title to a party whose transfer was duly registered, and she claimed that the transfer was a fraud upon her in that the consideration (certain stocks) was of no value; and that this was true although the transfer from her transferee had been by means of forgery, and the land had eventually been registered in the hands of a bona fide holder, as the forgery was a mere accident, and not connected with her particular claim.

<sup>37</sup> In Fotheringham v. Archer (1868) 5 W. W. & A'B (Vict.) 95, which seems to have been decided under act 140 of 1862, it was held that where one personates the owner and applies for registration, and has the land registered in the name of his grantee, the real owner must go against the fraud-doer, he not having been adjudged insolvent, and not against the registrar of titles. L.R.A.19161.

One bringing an action against the assurance fund must allege that the present holder is one bona fide, for value; for otherwise it does not appear that the plaintiff has been "deprived of land." Cox v. Bourne (1897) 7 Qd. L. J. 66.

<sup>38</sup> In Gilbert v. Bourne, (1895) 6 Qd. L. J. 270, an action against the assurance fund for fraud of an insolvent failed because the holder, who took from the fraud-doer, ought, under the circumstances, to have inquired and found out the fraud.

Where the registrar by mistake issued two certificates of title, and the sufferer thereby would have discovered the true state of the title from the original certificate of title to a tract of land, of which that in question formed part, and which original certificate was in the registrar's office, it was held that such sufferer was guilty of contributory negligence in not searching the register, and could not get relief from the assurance fund. Miller v. Davy (1889) 7 N. Z. L. R. 515.

Where a person about to take a transfer examined (by her agent) the register, but made no inquiry of the officers whether any instrument had been received for registration, but was not yet entered, she could have no recourse against the assurance fund, although, at the time of examination, an instrument had been received for registration and had been entered in a book called "the journal," which she had not examined, but was not then entered in the register. Re Jackson (1890) 10 N. the value of the buildings must be taken as they were at that time, and not as they were at the prior time when the certificate of registration was taken out.<sup>41</sup>

It seems that a remainderman whose land has been mortgaged is entitled to recourse against the assurance fund although his action, considered merely as an action for damages, would be premature.<sup>42</sup>

Cestuis que, trustent of a charge, who have been under a disability, may, although their trustees are barred by the statute of limitations, sue the registrar-general for damages, where the land subject to the charge has, by mistake in his office, been registered without the charge, as they have been deprived of an interest in land under the act.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>44</sup> In Cox v. Bourne (1897) 8 Qd. L. J. 66, where the case is confusedly reported, it seems to be held that where the deprived owner has suffered because the land has been mortgaged to a bona fide mortgagee, the owner's right is to recover from the assurance fund his expense of redemption not otherwise recoverable; and while he cannot, in general, get from the assurance fund more than the value of the land, if the amount due the mortgagee, with interest and the mortgagee's costs of the suit to redeem, exceeds the value of the land, the assurance fund ought to pay the amount of the mortgagee's costs and the plaintiff's costs besides the value of the land.

(It seems to be assumed that the agreement was unregistered, and it was held that grants from the Crown may be repealed while the property is in the hands of the original registered owners of such grants for any cause which would have been sufficient prior to the statute.)

<sup>50</sup> In Howard v. Miller [1915] A. C. (Eng.) 318, 84 L. J. P. C. N. S. 49, 112 L. T. N. S. 403, it appeared that a wife in British Columbia, having received a deed of land from her husband, and the same day given him back a deed for part of the land, after his death, handed the registrar the two deeds and signed a form prepared by him (possibly by his mistake), declaring that she was the owner of the whole land and that the only deed in her possession was the deed to her, and applying to be put upon the register of absolute fees (whose owners are deemed to be prima facie owners), which was done, and she thereafter contracted to convey the land. It was held that specific performance would not be granted on its appearing that there was a daughter entitled (subject to her mother's dower) to that part of the land which the wife had conveyed back to the husband, but that the purchaser was entitled to a lien on the dower interest for what he had paid.

An administrator holding a certificate of title as such, and entitled to one third of the land, was allowed the value of his improvements as against his children, the other owners. Droop v. Colonial Bank (1881) 7 Vict. L. R. 71, where the administrator had mortgaged, and the mortgagee was held to have the mortgagor's rights.

A mortgage of a lease is entitled to registration, as it is not within the statute providing that "no lessee or licensee shall transfer the possession or occupation of the land leased to or occupied by him, or any part thereof by sale, under lease or other disposition, except the board shall sanction the purposed transfer." King v. Stuart (1887) 5 N. Z. S. C. 304.

In Reeves v. Konschur (1907) 2 Sask. L. R. 125, 10 West. L. R. (Can.) 680, the holder of a first mortgage assigned it to an execution creditor of the mortgagor, who also took a transfer to herself from the mortgagor, there being a second mortgage outstanding; the register issued her a certificate of title which did not show the first mortgage nor assignment, and the chief justice, upon reference to him, declined to interfere with this decision. [See (1907) 1 Sask. L. R. 24, 7 West. L. R. (Can.) 301.] Upon application of the holders of the second mortgage to foreclose it, it was held that the transferee of the first mortgage was entitled to show the first mortgage, and that it had not merged, the court not criticizing the decision of the chief justice, apparently on the theory that he did not have the entire facts before him; but held that his decision was not a bar to such a defense.

It may be noted that where there were two innocent purchasers for value, one of whom contracted June 25, it was held that his equitable title was protected by his caveat, lodged July 1, and entered in the register July 15; the other having contracted June 26, paid the money and got the transfer and the seller's certificate July 14, and filed the papers August 13. Re Scanlan (1887) 3 Qd. L. J. 43.

While without the scope of this note, it may be noted that it was held by the court of New South Wales in Doe ex dem. Irving v. Gannon (1847) 1 Legge (N. S. W.) 400, that the provision in the act as to registration of deeds (7 Vict. No. 16 (1843) N. S. W. § 11), that all deeds, etc., "which shall be executed or made bona fide or for valuable consideration and which shall be duly registered," etc., shall have priority "not according to their respective dates, but according to the priority of the registration thereof only," was not effective unless the maker of the instrument acted bona fide. And this principle was affirmed in Doe ex dem. Peacock v. King (1854) 2 Legge (N. S. W.) 827. (The statutes, however, were later changed to make the bad faith only of the conveyer immaterial. 22 Vict. No. 1 N. S. W. § 18 (1858) and 24 Vict. No. 7 N. S. W. (1861) § 1.) But these cases were not followed in Davidson v. O'Halloran [1913] Vict. L. R. 367, the court holding that a grantee acting honestly would be protected where the deed effectuated a real transaction in land, the act (real property act of 1890, § 181) providing that the first registered instruments shall have priority "if made and executed bona fide and for valuable consideration."

It may also be noted that it was held in Jones v. Collins, 12 N. S. W. L. R. 247, that the expression in the act for registration of deeds, 7 Vict. No. 16 (1843) § 11, as to deeds having priority according to registration "executed or made bona fide or for valuable consideration" should read, "executed or made bona fide and for valuable consideration." A PPEAL by claimant from a decree of the Superior Court for Hartford County setting aside an award of the Commissioner in a proceeding under the workmen's compensation act to obtain compensation for personal injuries sustained by claimant while in defendant's employ. Affirmed.

Statement by Beach, J.:

The claimant was foreman of the knitting room of the Glastonbury Knitting Company, where he had been employed for several years, and on the 9th of February, 1915, sustained an injury resulting in the loss of the second, third, and fourth fingers and a portion of the first finger of the left hand. The commissioner finds that the injury was sustained under the following circumstances: "In the plant of the respondent there was a galvanized iron pipe about 1½ or 2 feet in diameter used for conveying heated air into the dry room. In the room adjoining the dry room there was an opening in this pipe consisting presumably of a small door. It was a custom of the employees, not prohibited, and presumably acquiesced in by the employer, for the employees to heat their bottles of tea or coffee through the instrumentality of the air from this pipe. The usual custom was to heat the bottles in the dry room at the place where the heated air was emitted. On this particular occasion the claimant, instead of placing his bottle at the mouth of the pipe in the dry room, went around and attempted to place it inside the pipe through the door hereinbefore described, not knowing that inside the pipe was a revolving fan. It was the contact of the bottle and his hand with the fan which caused the injury. The language of the witness in describing his act was as follows: 'I went into the dry room, and didn't see any place there, and went around in front of the pipe; I did not know there was a fan there. When I put the bottle in it hit the bottle.' The witness was unable to recall just why he departed from his usual custom, but was under the impression that something must have been piled up against the opening in the dry room. The claimant had a right to be in the room in which he was injured, and some of the men whom he supervised worked there."

The commissioner held that the claimant was entitled to compensation, and the employer appealed to the superior court for the county of Hartford, which rendered a judgment allowing the appeal and setting aside the award.

Beach, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question is whether the claimant's injury arose "out of and in the course of his employment," and the proper construction of that phrase, which now comes before us for the first time, is of great importance, because it controls the determination of what sorts of injuries may properly be brought within the operation of our workmen's compensation act (Laws 1913, chap. 138). The same phrase used in the same controlling sense is found in the workmen's compensation acts of England and of many of our states, and in the literary sense its construction appears to be well settled, although the application of it to particular cases has given rise to differences of opinion which are not easily harmonized. It seems to be agreed that the words "arising out of and in the course of his employment" do not make the employer an insurer against all the risks of the business, but include only those injuries arising from the risks of the business which are suffered while the employee is acting within the scope of his employment. In McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, L.R.A.1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 522, Chief Justice Rugg says of this phrase: "It is sufficient to say that an injury is received 'in the course of' the employment when it comes while the workman is doing the duty which he is employed to perform. It 'arises out of' the employment, when there is apparent to the rational mind, upon consideration of all the circumstances, a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury. . . . But it excludes an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause, and which comes from a hazard to which the workman would have been equally exposed apart from the employment. The causative danger must be peculiar to the work, and not common to the neighborhood. It must be incidental to the character of the business, and not independent of the relation of master and servant. It need not have been foreseen or expected, but after the event it must appear to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence."

Act, § 573; 1 Bradbury, Workmen's Comp. Act, p. 398.

Was the claimant at the time of the injury doing the duty which he was employed to perform, and was there a causal connection between the conditions surrounding the performance of his work and the resulting injury? In approaching these questions we take into consideration the fact that the act is in a very large sense remedial, and that the legislature intended to fix upon the employer a liability which, though sounding in contract, need not depend at all upon the breach of any duty by the employer. Bayon v. Beckley, 89 Conn. 154, 161, 93 Atl. 139, 8 N. C. C. A. 588. It is plain enough from the terms of the act that, when an injury arising from a risk of the business is suffered while the employee is doing the thing which his employment fairly requires him to do, he will be entitled to compensation (except when the injury is caused by the wilful and serious misconduct of the injured employee, or by his intoxication), although he was doing the work in a negligent or unusual way. It is also true that, when an injury arising from a risk of the business is suffered while the employee, though not strictly in the line of his obligatory duty, is still doing something incidental to the performance of his work, in going to or from the work, or in the necessary intervals of an intermittent employment, he will (subject to the same exceptions) be entitled to compensation. Finally, the same right to compensation will follow if an injury arising from a risk of the business is suffered while the employee is doing something which, although quite outside of his obligatory duty, is permitted by his employer for their mutual convenience, such as eating his dinner on the premises, or any similar act to the performances of which the employer has assented. Blovelt v. Sawyer (1903) 20 Times L. R. 105, [1904] 1 K. B. 271, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 155, 68 J. P. 110, 52 Week. Rep. 503, 89 L. T. N. S. 658, 6 W. C. C. 16; Morris v. Lambeth (1905) 22 Times L. R. 22, 8 W. On the other hand, if the injury, although it arises out of a risk of the business, is received while the employee has turned aside from his employment for his own purposes, so that he is not acting within the scope of his employment, no compensation can be given. Read v. Great Western R. Co. [1909] A. C. 31, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 31, 99 L. T. N. S. 781, 25 Times L. R. 36, 53 Sol. Jo. 31; Bryce v. Edward Lloyd Co. 2 B. W. C. C. 26, [1909] 2 K. B. 804, 101 L. T. N. S. 472, 25 Times L. R. 759, 53 Sol. Jo. 744; Spooner v. Detroit Saturday Night, — Mich. —, L.R.A.1916A, 17, 153 N. W. 657, 9 N. C. C. A. 647; Keen v. St. Clement's Press, 7 B. W. C. C. 542.

In the present case the commissioner has found in substance, if not in words, that the employer knew of the employees' custom of heating bottles in the dry room at the mouth of the hot-air pipe, and, upon principles familiar to courts before compensation acts were invented, the right to so heat bottles became, by the tacit consent of the employer, a term or condition added to the contract of employment; so that, if the injury, which clearly arose from a risk of the business, had occurred while the claimant was engaged in heating his bottle at the customary time and place, he would doubtless have been entitled to compensation. The finding does not inform us whether the injury was received at a time when it was customary for the employees to place their bottles for heating; and, in the absence of any finding as to that fact, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that it was unreasonable for a foreman, whose supervisory duties are not necessarily continuous, to place his bottle for heating at 11:30 A. M., at which time the accident occurred. The precise question, therefore, is whether the claimant, in attempting to heat his bottle in a place which was not the customary place, and was not a place whose use for the purpose of heating bottles had been assented to by the employer, was acting "within the scope of his employment." This question is not in principle a new one, and it may be answered by pointing out that an act which is quite outside of the servant's duties, and is not in itself or in the manner of doing it a consequence of the conditions surrounding the performance of those duties, cannot be brought within the scope of the employment, except by proof of the special assent of the employer, actual or imputed. In ascertaining the scope of the servant's employment it has long been the rule to take into account what the servant was required to do, the conditions surrounding the performance of his work, and also whatever else, with the knowledge and assent of the employer, he actually did do. Further than that we cannot go, because the relation is contractual, and, except by a valid exercise of the police power, its terms cannot be enlarged L.R.A.1916D.

It is quite true, under the workmen's compensation act, that when the scope of the employment is once ascertained, any injury arising out of and in the course of it is to be compensated for, although the employee acted in a negligent or unusual way. This is the principle on which the claimant's counsel relies, contending that the scope of the employment had been enlarged by the known custom of heating bottles at the mouth of the hot-air pipe, and that therefore the claimant is entitled to compensation, although he attempted to heat his bottle on this occasion in an unusual way. But, when the injury arises from his own act, the claimant must first show that the act which caused it was within the scope of his employment; and if the act is one which has no direct relation to his employment or to the conditions surrounding the work, there is no presumption that the master has assented to it in advance, and therefore it cannot be brought within the scope of his employment at all, except by evidence affirmatively showing that it was done with the knowledge and assent of the employer. And if the knowledge and assent to the employer as shown by the evidence is limited to a particular way of doing such an act, it follows that the act, if done in an unusual way, may or may not be within the scope of the employment, according to the circumstances of the case. As to such acts the scope of the employment is coextensive with the master's knowledge and assent. The scope of the employment is to be determined, like the scope of any other contractual relation, by the mutual intent of the parties, which, in a case like this, ultimately rests on the intent of the master, to be ascertained upon the principle that one intends the natural consequences of that which he has permitted to be done.

The issue then takes the form of an inquiry whether the claimant's act in putting his bottle into the hot-air pipe in an adjoining room was a natural consequence of the master's permission to heat bottles in the dry room at the mouth of the hot-air pipe; so that the master, in assenting to the latter custom of heating bottles, may fairly be said to have assented also to the claimant's deviation from that custom. We think not. The finding is that the usual custom was to heat the bottles in the dry room at the place where the heated air was emitted. In the room adjoining the dry room there was an opening in this pipe consisting presumably of a small door. On this particular occasion the claimant, to quote the language of the commissioner,

"instead of placing his bottle at the mouth of the pipe in the dry room, went around and attempted to place it inside the pipe through the door hereinbefore described, not knowing that inside the pipe was a revolving fan." We think it is quite clear that the master's assent to the custom of heating bottles in the dry room at the mouth of the pipe cannot reasonably be said to involve his assent to the claimant's act of going into another room and attempting to put his bottle inside of the hot-air pipe through a door which led to a revolving fan. The finding of the commissioner does not contain any facts which tend to show that the master ought reasonably to have expected the claimant to do this; and, in the absence of any such findings of fact, we think there was nothing from which the commissioner could reasonably conclude that the employer had, in effect, assented in advance to the performance of the act which caused the claimant's injury. In Keen v. St. Clement's Press, 7 B. W. C. C. 542, the claimant was placing a tin of milk on a ledge underneath the moving machinery of a press, when his hand was injured by coming in contact with a revolving plate. It was customary for the workmen to take tea at 5 o'clock and to prepare their tea beforehand; and the claimant had gone to the place where the hot-water urn was kept and had returned with the tea when he was injured. The only point in which he went outside of the custom as known to the employer was in putting the tin of milk under the press to hide it from the night shift; and the court of appeals held that, because the employer had no knowledge of any custom of placing tins of milk under the press, the accident did not arise out of the claimant's employment. That case is very like the present one in all material points. Here, as there, the act which resulted in the injury was outside of the servant's duty, and not one which was a consequence of the conditions surrounding the performance of his work, or of conditions to which the master could fairly be said to have assented, and it subjected the claimant to the added risk from which the injury resulted. In this case it is apparent that the injury did not arise out of the employment, because there was no causal connection between the conditions under which the claimant's work was required to be done and the resulting injury.

There is no error.

Wheeler, J.

I concur in the result, and in the holding that the claimant, when injured, was not doing his employer's work, but doing something in his own way—and a way not L.R.A.1916D.

permitted by his employer—and for his own benefit, and hence his injury did not arise out of his employment.

I agree with the doctrine of Keen v. St. Clement's Press, 7 B. W. C. C. 542, and McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, L.R.A. 1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 522, as cited, in their holding that the terms arising "in the course of the employment" and arising "out of the employment" are independent and conjunctive terms.

I do not concur generally in the opinion, through my fear that it confounds these terms, and treats and holds them to be equivalents. And, further, because I fear that the opinion holds that the claimant was not at the time of his injury in the course of his employment, and I am of the opinion that he was, and that his momentary departure from his work to do something for his own benefit, although permitted by his master so to do yet done in a manner and place not permitted, did not take him at the time of his injury out of the course of his employment. The authorities seem to support this view. Moore v. Manchester Liners [1910] A. C. 498, 500, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1175, 103 L. T. N. S. 226, 26 Times L. R. 618, 54 Sol. Jo. 703, 3 B. W. C. Mr. T. F. West, Attorney General, for plaintiff in error:

Relators, having an adequate remedy by other proceedings at law, if such claim is a legal and proper charge or obligation, are not entitled to enforce the collection of the same by mandamus.

State ex rel. Ellis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 53 Fla. 650, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 320, 44 So. 213, 12 Ann. Cas. 359; State ex rel. Walker v. Stewart, 49 Fla. 259, 38 So. 600; Johns v. Orange County, 28 Fla. 626, 10 So. 96; State ex rel. Edwards v. Sumter County, 22 Fla. 1.

The payment of this claim was not a lawful appropriation of public school funds.

Pennock v. State, 61 Fla. 386, 54 So. 1004; State ex rel. Bours v. L'Engle, 40 Fla. 392, 24 So. 539; Brown v. Lakeland, 61 Fla. 508, 54 So. 716; Board of Public Instruction v. Groom, 57 Fla. 347, 48 So. 641; State ex rel. Baas v. McKinnon, 68 Fla. 548, 67 So. 77.

Messrs. Davis & Giles, for defendants in error:

If the legal remedy is not entirely adequate, mandamus lies. A remedy which will avoid mandamus must be specific and adequate.

Ray v. Wilson, 29 Fla. 342, 14 L.R.A. 773, 10 So. 613; State ex rel. Baas v. McKinnon, 68 Fla. 548, 67 So. 77. L.R.A.1916D.

If there has been no illegality or abuse of authority by the county board, it is the superintendent's mandatory duty to sign the warrant.

State ex rel. Moody v. Barnes, 25 Fla. 298, 23 Am. St. Rep. 516, 5 So. 722.

Per Curiam:

It appears that, pursuant to contracts made by the county board of public instruction for Orange county with certain persons for their services as teachers in the public schools of said county, the board ordered warrants drawn for the agreed salaries of the teachers; that the county superintendent of public instruction for Orange county, who is by law secretary of the board of public instruction for such county, refused to countersign said warrant drawn in favor of such teachers; that the board employed the relators, who are practising attorneys at law, to prosecute legal proceedings to require the county superintendent to countersign the warrants drawn in favor of said teachers for their salaries, and that such attorneys by legal proceedings procured a mandate requiring the superintendent of public instruction to countersign said warrants for teachers' salaries; that for such legal services rendered by the relators, the board of public instruction for Orange county agreed to pay relators $250, and ordered a warrant drawn for said amount; that the warrant was drawn and signed by the chairman of the county board of public instruction, but the respondent county superintendent of public instruction refused to countersign said warrant, as was his legal duty, whereupon the relators brought mandamus proceedings to require the county superintendent of public instruction to countersign the warrant drawn as compensation for such legal services rendered by the relators at the instance of the board.

The respondent defended on the ground, among others, that the payment thus sought to be made from the county school fund is illegal. The court ordered a peremptory writ, and the respondent took writ of error.*

The county superintendent of public instruction may by mandamus be required to countersign a warrant duly ordered and drawn by the county board of public instruction, in a proper amount, and for a proper purpose, where there is no fraud, illegality, or abuse of authority in the action of the board. State ex rel. Baas v. McKinnon, 68 Fla. 548, 67 So. 77. But the county superintendent will not by mandamus be required to countersign a warrant that is drawn for a purpose not authorized by law. See State ex rel. Walker v. Stewart, 49 Fla. 259, 38 So. 600; State ex rel. Baas v. McKinnon, supra.

The Constitution provides that "the county school fund . . . shall be disbursed by the county board of public instruction solely for the maintenance and support of public free schools." Section 9, art. 12. And the school subdistrict taxes are "for the exclusive use of public free schools within the district." Section 10, art. 12.

The school funds under our Constitution are to be regarded as a sacred trust; and the provisions of law safeguarding expenditures from such funds should be strictly construed, and the mandate of the Constitution enforced. See Pennock v. State, 61 Fla. 383, 54 So. 1004.

The employment of attorneys to conduct litigation to require the county superintendent to countersign warrants issued by the county board of public instruction for teachers' salaries is not such a county school purpose as will warrant payment therefor from county school funds that, by the express command of the Constitution, "shall be disbursed . . . solely for the maintenance and support of public free schools." If a county superintendent unlawfully refuses to countersign a warrant, he may be required to do so by the party entitled to the warrant or by the proper officer of the state, or he may be suspended from office by the governor for misfeasance or neglect of duty in office.

The education of the children of the state, for whose benefit the county school fund is provided, has not such relation to the refusal of a county superintendent to countersign warrants drawn for the teachers' salaries as to make the payment of attorney fees to secure such countersigning a part of the "maintenance and support of public free schools."

The judgment awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus is reversed.

Annotation—Use of public funds to pay expense incurred by officer or citizen in litigation.

The use of public funds to pay counsel assigned to defend an indigent person is not treated in this annotation. For a discussion of a phase of that subject, see note to Pardee v. Salt Lake County, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 377.

The reimbursement from public funds, of litigation expenses incurred by public officers in the discharge of their duties, is also excluded; and in connection with that question, see State ex rel. Crow v. St. Louis, 61 L.R.A. 593, and cases in note to Daggett v. Colgan, 14 L.R.A. 477.

The decision in McKINNON v. STATE, ante, 90, is in accordance with a fundamental principle of our government that public funds shall not be used for private purposes.

*Expenses incurred by public officers in defending charges.

Counsel fees and other expenses incurred by public officers in successfully defending criminal charges or charges of official misconduct are incurred for a private purpose, and cannot, in the absence of a statutory provision therefor, be paid from public funds. Shaw v. Macon (1856) 19 Ga. 468; Gilbert v. Berlin (1912) 76 N. H. 470, 84 Atl. 235; People ex rel. Merritt v. Lawrence (1843) 6 Hill (N. Y.) 244.

A municipality cannot legally vote to pay expenses in defending criminal charges or charges of official misconduct, L.R.A.1916D.

incurred by officers who are not the servants or agents of the municipality, or did not act as such in the matter of the alleged misconduct, where the municipality has no interest to protect in such matter. Gove v. Epping (1860) 41 N. H. 539; Merrill v. Plainfield (1863) 45 N. H. 126; Gilbert v. Berlin (1912) 76 N. H. 470, 84 Atl. 235.

A city has no power to assume the payment of the expenses incurred by supervisors in defending an action for neglect of official duty, or of the statutory penalties to which they have been subjected. Halstead v. New York (1850) 3 N. Y. 430.

Where a bill was brought in the name of the state on the relation of a large number of citizens of a city, against its mayor, council, and other officials, charging them with the grossest malfeasance in office, and praying for an injunction restraining them from dealing in alleged fraudulently executed city warrants, and for the appointment of a receiver to control the finances of the city, which prayers were granted, it was held in an action against the city by an attorney retained by the mayor to defend the bill, whose retainer was ratified by the city council, that the city had no interest in defending the bill, and was therefore not liable for the attorney's fees, and that his retainer did not bind it. Smith v. Nashville (1879) 4 Lea (Tenn.) 69.

There is a conflict in the cases as to the constitutionality of statutes authorizing the use of public funds to pay expenses incurred by public officers in the successful defense of criminal charges, or of proceedings to remove them from office, but the weight of authority and the more recent cases uphold the validity of such statutes, so far as they are prospective in operation.

A statute providing for the defrayal by a city or county or the state, of reasonable counsel fees and expenses paid or incurred by a city, county, or state officer who shall have been successful in any trial or proceeding to remove him from office, or to convict him of any crime in the performance of, or in connection with, his official duties, was held unconstitutional, mainly upon the ground that it was, in effect, a method of taking private property, not for public use, but for the benefit of private individuals. Re Fallon (1899) 28 Misc. 748, 59 N. Y. Supp. 849.

But that holding was made upon the authority of Re Jensen (1899) 28 Misc. 373, 59 N. Y. Supp. 653 (involving the same statute), which was affirmed in (1899) 44 App. Div. 509, 60 N. Y. Supp. 933, upon the ground principally that the prosecution of the officer had wholly terminated before the statute took effect, the appellate court stating: "A different question would arise in considering legislation for the reimbursement of innocent parties in criminal prosecutions, if the legislation were wholly prospective in its operation. . . . The purpose that we have to deal with here, and which seems to me to lack the public character necessary to sustain valid taxation, is a purpose to pay money on account of occurrences wholly past before the legislation took effect, which imposed no legal or moral obligation on the state at the time they happened, and from which the state received no conceivable benefit. It may be that purely prospective legislation announcing the intention of the state to pay such expenses incurred in future cases would be deemed expressive of a public purpose, and that the assurance thus given might be regarded as creating such an obligation as to relieve the subsequent payment from the objection that it was a mere gratuity."

The same statute was held unconstitutional in two other cases, but in both of them the claims of the officers arose long before the passage of the statute. Re Straus (1899) 44 App. Div. 425, 61 N. Y. Supp. 37; Chapman v. New York L.R.A.1916D.

And upon an application by a constable for the payment of expenses incurred in defending an indictment for murder, where the indictment was purely upon the theory that the accused killed the deceased as an individual, and the defense accepted that view and proved that the killing was accidental after the abandonment of an effort to arrest the deceased, the court avoided passing upon the question of the constitutionality of the same statute by holding that it was not intended to provide compensation for officers indicted as individuals for criminal conduct, even though the events connected with the occasion for the indictment were in some manner affected by the official station of the applicant. Re Labrake (1899) 29 Misc. 87, 60 N. Y. Supp. 571.

A similar municipal charter provision was held constitutional in so far as it was not retroactive. Kane v. McClellan (1905) 110 App. Div. 44, 96 N. Y. Supp. 806; Deuel v. Gaynor (1910) 141 App. Div. 630, 126 N. Y. Supp. 112. In the former case, the court said: "A statutory enactment providing in advance for the reimbursement to a public officer of the reasonable expenses actually incurred by him in defending himself against a criminal prosecution based upon a charge of official misconduct is within the constitutional power of the legislature, and not forbidden by any express or implied prohibition contained in the fundamental law of the state. The conditional promise to reimburse contained in such statute may be regarded as a part of the compensation which the state, city, or town, as the case may be, stipulates that the officer shall receive in return for the services to be by him rendered. In this sense, the purpose to be subserved is a public purpose, just as is the purpose in view in providing a specified salary, that is to say, the procurement of suitable and qualified persons to discharge the duties of the office."

The provision of a statute creating a board of police commissioners of a city, that all the salaries, as well as the necessary expenses, of the commissioners, shall be paid by the city, does not contemplate the payment from the municipal funds of expenses incurred by the commissioners in defending themselves against charges of official misconduct. Gilbert v. Berlin (1912) 76 N. H. 470, 84 Atl. 235.

A statute authorizing the directors of a school district to employ counsel in suits against them does not empower them to pay out of the district funds attorneys' fees and stenographers' fees incurred in defending a charge of fraud upon the district in connection with the construction of a schoolhouse. Scott v. Independent Dist. (1894) 91 Iowa, 156, 59 N. W. 15.

Expenses incurred by public officers in establishing title to office.

The propriety and legality of the use of public funds to pay counsel fees and other expenses incurred by a public officer in establishing his title to the office depend upon the question whether the legal services rendered are for the public benefit, or whether the governmental agency to which the office pertains has any interest in the controversy.

Where one holding a position in the exempt class in the civil service of a city is transferred to a new position in the competitive class at a time when there is no eligible list for such position, and in a subsequent examination attains fourth place, and the civil service commission refuses to certify his pay rolls upon the ground that his transfer was illegal, and that an appointment to his position could be made only from the three standing highest on the eligible list, counsel fees and disbursements incurred by him in mandamus proceedings, in which such commission is compelled to certify his pay rolls and to classify his new position in the exempt class, can be paid by the city, because the settlement of the questions raised in such proceedings is for the public benefit. Peters v. Justice (1912) 75 Misc. 504, 133 N. Y. Supp. 847.

A city has power to pay a bill for legal services rendered to a city official in the successful defense of an action by the people, through the attorney general, to oust him from office upon the sole ground that he is an alien, and therefore disqualified from holding the office. McCredie v. Buffalo (1885) 2 How. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 336.

The de jure council of a city by motion elected an attorney special city counselor, to bring suit to reinstate them and the other de jure officers into offices at that time claimed and occupied by others, and in the motion was embodied a resolution to pay the attorney a certain sum if he won the suit, and to assess the persons passing the resolution a specified amount to pay him if he lost. The attorney won and brought an action for his services against the city and the L.R.A.1916D.

de jure councilmen, and judgment was rendered in favor of the city, and against the other defendants. The attorney did not appeal from the judgment in favor of the city, and upon appeal by the other defendants, it was held that they were endeavoring to contract for the city and, though without authority to bind it, were not personally liable. Martin v. Schuermeyer (1912) 30 Okla. 735, 121 Pac. 248.

The legislature has the power to pass an act to reimburse a city official out of the public funds, for expenses incurred by him in procuring the transfer of the books, securities, and funds of his office from his predecessor, and in defending and establishing his title to the office. Stilwell v. New York (1863) 19 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 376.

A county has no interest in an action by a supervisor to establish his right to the office of police commissioner, to which he was appointed by the board of supervisors, and therefore his counsel fees are not a legal charge against the county. Richmond County v. Ellis (1875) 59 N. Y. 620.

Counsel fees incurred by a county collector in successfully resisting objections to his bond are not a proper charge against the county, as it had no interest in the suit. Fry v. Chicot County (1881) 37 Ark. 117.

Expenses incurred by citizens for benefit of municipality.

A citizen who, by mandamus proceedings, compels the city council to collect, and a manufacturing company to pay, taxes upon property which the council has unconstitutionally exempted from taxation, is not a representative of the city, so as to make it liable in an action by the citizen's attorney, for his reasonable counsel fees in such proceedings. Park v. Laurens (1903) 68 S. C. 212, 46 S. E. 1012; Milster v. Spartanburg (1903) 68 S. C. 243, 47 S. E. 141.

But in the former case the court said: "We do not say that no case could arise where a citizen would be entitled to reimbursement from the city of funds expended as attorneys' fees or otherwise in maintaining a suit for its benefit. . . . The right of . . . [the citizen] to bring his action for counsel fees and other expenses, on the ground that he made these disbursements in securing a public municipal right which the city council refused to enforce, is not here involved. Such an action would in no wise depend upon any claim by . . . [the citizen's] attorney to represent the city, . . . such as is alleged in this complaint; but, if it could stand at all, would have to rest on the principle thus laid down in Keener on Quasi Contracts, 341: 'Where an obligation is imposed by law upon a person to do an act, because of the interest which the public has in its performance, it would seem that, on the defendant's failure to perform, a person performing the same with the expectation of receiving compensation should be allowed to recover against the defendant.'"

Where a town desirous of settling its boundary line votes to indemnify a townsman owning land on the line, for the costs and expenses of a suit in his name to establish the disputed line, he can recover under the vote of indemnity, although he has a personal interest in the suit, and the defect in the proof of his title is the cause of his defeat, the jury finding that the true line is the one claimed by the town. Baker v. Windham (1836) 13 Me. 74. G. V. I.

CITY OF CHICAGO et al., Appts.

(271 Ill. 288, 111 N. E. 119.)

Municipal corporations — power to prohibit show near church.

1. Charter authority to regulate and prohibit amusements empowers a municipal corporation to refuse a license for a moving picture show within 200 feet of a church, although the clause of the charter dealing with places of amusement gives power to regulate only.

For other cases, see Licensee, II. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Theater — prohibiting near church — police power.

2. Prohibiting the operation of a moving picture show within 200 feet of a church is within the police power.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. c, 4, b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

The amusement ordinances of Chicago forbid one to present a show, concert, lecture, or other amusement within 200 feet of a church, if presented for gain, but permit a show, concert, lecture, or other amusement to be presented within 200 feet of a church, if no admission fee is charged; hence the ordinance is discriminatory and invalid.

The ordinance in question is unreasonable in that it forbids one who owns real estate within 200 feet of a church, to conduct any kind of amusement thereon, if any admission fee be charged, no matter how harmless, nor what the purpose of the entertainment might be. Offensive and inoffensive amusements are classed alike.

The owner of real estate has a constitutional right to the use of his property as he sees fit, so long as he does not endanger or threaten the safety, health, comfort, and general welfare of the city.

Farmer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, Frank Nahser, brought an action of mandamus against the city of Chicago, and the mayor and clerk thereof, to compel them to issue to him a license to conduct a motion picture show. Appellee is the lessee of a building at Fifty-third street and Harper avenue, in the city of Chicago. The adjoining premises on the west are the property of the First Presbyterian Church of Hyde Park. The church edifice and buildings attached occupy the property of the church up to the building in which it is proposed to conduct a motion picture show, and have so occupied said premises for forty years. The building in which it is proposed to conduct the show has been constructed within the last two years. At and before the time the permit was applied for and issued for the construction of the building, there was an ordinance in force in the city of Chicago, classifying entertainments for which the public was required to pay an admission fee into twenty-one classes, and requiring licenses for their operation. One of the provisions of the ordinance is that none of the entertainments so classified "shall be produced, offered, presented, or carried on within 200 feet of any hospital, church, or building used exclusively for educational purposes."

Notice of this ordinance, and that a license would be refused for the carrying on of an entertainment in the building contrary to the provisions of the ordinance, was stamped upon the building plans at the time permission was given to construct the building. The answer avers that a kindergarten is conducted in a building between the church auditorium and the building where it is proposed to conduct the picture show; that children of tender years are taught in said kindergarten; that there are services in the church daily; that it has a membership of 900; that about 500 children attend the Sunday school and a large number attend the kindergarten, and that a motion picture show in the building leased by appellee would interfere with the services in the church and annoy persons attending the same. The wall between appellee's building and the church, as alleged in the petition, is 36 inches thick and sound-proof. Appellee's contention is that the city was without power to adopt the ordinance, and that, in so far as it purports to authorize the city to prohibit his carrying on the proposed show, it is invalid. To the answer to the petition, which set up and relied upon the ordinance as justifying the refusal to grant the license, a demurrer was interposed by appellee and sustained by the court. Appellants electing to stand by their answer, judgment was rendered for the petitioner and the peremptory writ of mandamus awarded. Appellants prayed an appeal, and the trial court certified the validity of a municipal ordinance was involved, and the public interest required the appeal to be taken directly to the supreme court.

The sole question to be determined is the validity of the ordinance prohibiting amusements for which the public is required to pay an admission fee, within 200 feet of a church. It is not disputed that the building in which it is sought to conduct a motion picture show is within 200 feet of a church, but it is claimed the city had no power to prohibit the show and that the ordinance is invalid. Appellee insists that clause 41 of ¶ 62 of the cities and villages act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1913, p. 272) delegates power to cities to regulate and prohibit amusements, but that the power to regulate places of amusement is found in clause 58 of said paragraph, and does not include the power to prohibit; that clause 41 relates to the amusements themselves, while clause 58 deals with the buildings or places where amusements are conducted, and from this it is argued it was intended the power to prohibit should apply to amusements of an objectionable character, but not to amusements objectionable on account of the place where they are conducted. Clause 41 confers upon the city council the right "to license, tax, regulate, suppress, and prohibit . . . theatricals and other exhibitions, shows, and amusements, and to revoke such license at pleasure." Clause 58 grants the power "to regulate places of amusement." The power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit. People ex rel. Goldberg v. Busse, 240 Ill. 338, 88 N. E. 831. Assuming clause 58 relates to places of amusement, and not to amusements themselves, and that under it no power is given to prohibit amusements on account of location, what effect and meaning are to be given to clause 41? Taking appellee's view as correct, the power to prohibit amusements could only be exercised because of the character of the show; that is, because it is a nuisance. But, independently of clause 41, cities possessed the power to prohibit nuisances, and it could not have been enacted for the purpose of granting them that power. If it be said such shows cannot be prohibited where their proximity to a church, school, or hospital interferes with such church, school, or hospital's use and enjoyment, or that the city has no power under any circumstances to prohibit shows because of the places where they are carried on, then the power granted by clause 41 to prohibit would seem meaningless. Clause 41 gave cities all the power the state had to do the things purported to be authorized by said clause, subject to no limitations except those imposed by the Constitution upon the legislature. Metropolis Theatre Co. v. Chicago, 246 Ill. 20, L.R.A.1916D.

92 N. E. 597. It follows, if the legislature had the power to pass an act prohibiting amusements of the character under consideration within 200 feet of a church, that power was granted to the city council. The legislature had not the power to pass an act prohibiting all amusements, but only such as came within the legitimate exercise of the police power. Would it have been a legitimate exercise of that power for the legislature to have enacted a law prohibiting a motion picture show within 200 feet of a church? We are of opinion the answer must be in the affirmative.

Under what circumstances or conditions the police power of the state may be exercised was defined in Chicago v. Netcher, 183 Ill. 104, 48 L.R.A. 261, 75 Am. St. Rep. 93, 55 N. E. 707, as follows: "In order to sustain legislative interference with the business of the citizen by virtue of the police power, it is necessary that the act should have some reasonable relation to the subjects included in such power. If it is claimed that the statute or ordinance is referable to the police power, the court must be able to see that it tends in some degree toward the prevention of offenses or the preservation of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare. It must be apparent that some such end is the one actually intended, and that there is some connection between the provisions of the law and such purpose. If it is manifest that the statute or ordinance has no such object, but, under the guise of a police regulation, is an invasion of the property rights of the individual, it is the duty of the court to declare it void."

It is apparent that a motion picture show within 200 feet of a church having a large membership, a large Sunday school, and daily services, will be an interference with and an annoyance to religious worship. Interference with or the disturbance of the people engaging in religious worship may be prohibited under the exercise of the police power. Meyers v. Baker, 120 Ill. 567, 60 Am. Rep. 580, 12 N. E. 79. In that case it was held an act of the legislature prohibiting the establishment of a tent or booth within a certain distance of a camp or field meeting, for the sale of provisions or refreshments, without the permission of the authorities having charge of such meeting, was a valid police regulation; and in McPherson v. Chebanse, 114 Ill. 46, 55 Am. Rep. 857, 28 N. E. 454, an ordinance prohibiting keeping open places of business on Sunday was sustained on the same ground. In People ex rel. Busching v. Ericsson, 263 Ill. 368, L.R.A.1915D, 607, 105 N. E. 315, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 183, the court considered the validity of an ordinance declaring it unlawful to locate, build, or maintain a garage within 200 feet of any building used for a hospital, church, or school, or in any block in which two thirds of the buildings on both sides of the street are used exclusively for residence purposes, without securing the written consent of a majority of the property owners, according to frontage, on both sides of the street. The ordinance was held valid, and the court said: "The place where it was proposed to erect this structure is also within 200 feet of a church, and it is contended that this provision of the ordinance is an unreasonable restriction. The conduct of the affairs of a church, with its various meetings and assemblies in carrying out the purposes for which it is organized, is of such a character that a city is warranted in making such a restriction. The conduct of the business of a public garage would be as offensive to the members of a church as it would be to the occupants of a private residence, and would affect their comfort and welfare to the same extent."

While the business of keeping a dramshop is not a common-law right, and can be engaged in only in the manner and upon the terms prescribed by statute, the power granted municipalities to license, regulate, and prohibit the selling or giving away of intoxicating liquors has been held to confer the power to prohibit a dramshop on premises adjoining a public school (Harrison v. People, 222 Ill. 150, 78 N. E. 52), and to prohibit them in a district designated, or limit the number in a certain district (Swift v. People, 162 Ill. 534, 33 L.R.A. 470, 44 N. E. 528; People ex rel. Morrison v. Cregier, 138 Ill. 401, 28 N. E. 812). In the case last cited the court said: "Again, the proximity of premises to a church, seminary, schoolhouse, hospital, cemetery, or other public or private institution may undoubtedly be a good reason for including such premises in a district from which dramshops are excluded."

We are of opinion the state had the power to prohibit, by law, a motion picture show being conducted within 200 feet of a church, and that by clause 41 it granted that power to cities, and the ordinance in question was not an unreasonable exercise of that power.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the answer.

Petition for rehearing denied February 3, 1916.

Annotation—Power of state or municipality to determine location of places of amusement.

Generally, as to regulation affecting moving pictures, see note to State ex rel. Ebert v. Loden, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 193.

As to power of municipal corporation to declare particular kinds of amusement nuisances per se, see note to Re Jones, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 548.

But few reported cases have been found that have considered the question under annotation, and those in general are in harmony with NAHSER v. CHICAGO, ante, 95.

Thus, an ordinance making it unlawful to operate a moving picture show within a certain district of a city is a valid exercise of an express power conferred upon cities by the legislature to license, tax, regulate, restrain, or prohibit theatrical and other amusements. Dreyfus v. Montgomery (1912) 4 Ala. App. 270, 58 So. 730.

And such an ordinance is valid and operative as against one who at the time is operating such a show under a license from a city. (Ala.) Ibid. The report of this case does not show the facts bearing upon the reasonableness of the restrictions as to location. There is a L.R.A. 1916D.

suggestion in the case that the ordinance was challenged as a discrimination against colored persons, from which class patronage was drawn, but the court said that the ordinance appeared to be general in its nature and operation, and to contravene no common right, and make no class distinction. The court also observed that if the ordinance was not consistently enforced, that was no argument against it, or the power to pass such a regulation; that the correction of that evil lay in an entirely different forum.

Because of the manifest menace by fire and panic likely to result to school children and church congregations, it was held in Laurelle v. Bush (1911) 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 Pac. 953, that prohibiting the location of moving pictures within a distance of 200 feet from the front line of any church or school, or within 100 feet of the property line of the side or rear of any church or school, is not invalid as prescribing unreasonable or unnecessary conditions.

So, also, it was held in People ex rel. Moses v. Gaynor (1912) 77 Misc. 576, 137 N. Y. Supp. 196, that there was no abuse of discretion under a city ordinance requiring common shows to be licensed, in denying a license to maintain a moving picture show on premises which immediately adjoined a large public school and was opposite the parish and other buildings of a church.

A statute providing that the floor of any audience room in which moving picture exhibitions are given shall be the first or main floor of the building in which said room is located, and also providing that in municipalities having ordinances providing for the regulation and installation and operation of moving picture machines, nothing therein shall be construed to abrogate such local regulations, was held, in Jewel Theater Co. v. Fire Marshal (1914) 178 Mich. 399, 144 N. W. 835, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1212, to be a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and not to be in conflict with nor to abrogate, but to supplement, an ordinance of a city providing that "minor theaters which are not in actual operation at the time of the adoption of this ordinance shall not be located above the ground floor of any building within the city limits, nor shall any minor theater contain a balcony or gallery to be occupied by an audience," and so applies to moving picture theaters already in operation when the act was passed. The court stated that the act "does not conflict with the local regulation, but goes further. It disturbs what the local regulation does not disturb, namely, moving picture shows conducted on floors of buildings above the first floor. The local regulation is not abrogated, but is supplemented. The local regulation conferred upon complainant no right to give such exhibitions on the second floor of a building. It did not disturb it there. The statute is prospective in its operation and uniform in its application. . . . If the public safety or welfare demand that a particular business shall not be conducted in a particular place, the legislative power may be exercised to prevent it. Generally, it is by experience only that the necessary regulations of business are indicated, and the legislative power is not limited because the thing which experience has demonstrated should not continue is continuing when the legislature speaks."

But the power to regulate ten pin alleys, given by the general statutes to a city, does not authorize an ordinance forbidding the location of such alleys within the fire limits of the city, or within 100 yards of any private residence or business house, where the only place within the corporate limits and outside of the prohibited points at which such an alley could be located would be 600 yards from the business center and in a portion of the city remote from any thoroughfare or public place, since the power to regulate does not include the power to suppress or prohibit. Ex parte Patterson (1900) 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 256, 51 L.R.A. 654, 58 S. W. 1011.

And in Re Walker (1914) 84 Misc. 118, 146 N. Y. Supp. 519, where a license to operate a moving picture theater was refused upon the ground that there was danger from fire, it was held that the issuance of a license to operate a moving picture show may be compelled by mandamus where the theater was built and located prior to the passage of an ordinance providing that no moving picture show shall be maintained in any residence district of a city without the consent of a common council, approved by the mayor, and all lawful prerequisites of law relating to health, public safety from fire, and the reasonable regulations of the health and fire departments of the city, have been complied with. The court said that, the city having once given its permission that the building should be made into a moving picture theater, and the owner having incurred expense in its construction, its power over such building extends simply to regulating, and not prohibiting, its use for those purposes.

Again, it has been held that the location of a theater will not be prevented because it will interfere with an established business which is not permitted to be located within a certain distance of a building occupied by a theater.

Thus, it was held in Ormsby v. Bell (1915) — App. Div. —, 157 N. Y. Supp. 533, to be no ground for refusing a license to a theater that the adjacent premises were used for a business that requires a permit which cannot be issued for any building in which a compartment for volatile inflammable oil is within 50 feet of the nearest wall of any building occupied as a school, hospital, theater, or other place of public amusement or assembly. The court stated that "when the third person secured such permit, the land now occupied by the motion picture theater was vacant, and he incurred the risk of a subsequent legitimate use of such vacant lands by the owner and the consequence thereof. He had no legal assurance that such use would be limited so that his own occupation would not offend the ordinance, and he cannot now invoke the permit to that end, for thereby he would deprive the owner of his full property rights." This rule, if adhered to, would, it would seem, result in the closing of a theater or other place of amusement were it built adjacent to a vacant lot which might later be occupied by a building within a certain distance from which a theater was prohibited from being located. J. H. B.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN W. WATSON

v.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER POWER COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 156 N. W. 188.)

Explosives — blasting — injury by concussion — liability.

1. A private corporation organized to supply the public with electricity, and clothed with the power of eminent domain, is liable for injuries to neighboring property caused by concussion or vibration due to blasting in a navigable stream under license from the government, even though it is not negligent in the performance of the work.

For other cases, see Blasting, in Dig. 1-52 N. 8.

Master and servant — independent contractor — injury by blasting.

2. One cannot avoid liability for injury to neighboring property by the concussion from blasting, by letting the work to an independent contractor, if the contract contemplates blasting and the injury results even though the work is properly done.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, III. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. 8.

Damages — injury to property by blasting — cost of restoration.

3. The measure of damages for injury to property by blasting is the cost of restoration when that can be done at reasonable expense, and not the diminution in value of the property.

For other cases, see Damages, III. k, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. 8.

in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's property by blasting alleged to have been caused by defendant's wrongful and negligent acts. Affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. E. Blake and J. O. Boyd, for appellant:

Negligence is an essential element to recovery.

Bessemer Coal, Iron & Land Co. v. Doak, 152 Ala. 106, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 389, 44 So. 627; Benner v. Atlantic Dredging Co. 134 N. Y. 156, 17 L.R.A. 220, 30 Am. St. Rep. 649, 31 N. E. 328; Booth v. Rome, W. & O. Terminal R. Co. 140 N. Y. 267, 24 L.R.A. 105, 37 Am. St. Rep. 552, 35 N. E. 592; Holland House Co. v. Baird, 169 N. Y. 136, 62 N. E. 149, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 166; Page v. Dempsey, 184 N. Y. 245, 77 N. E. 9, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 135; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Bernstein, 113 Ga. 175, 38 S. E. 394; Simon v. Henry, 62 N. J. L. 486, 41 Atl. 692; Mitchell v. Prange, 110 Mich. 78, 34 L.R.A. 182, 64 Am. St. Rep. 329, 67 N. W. 1096; Slatten v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 29 Iowa, 149, 4 Am. Rep. 205; McMillin v. Staples, 36 Iowa, 532; Walker v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 658, 33 N. W. 224; Ochiltree v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 631, 62 N. W. 7; Ocheltree v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 96 Iowa, 246, 64 N. W. 788; MacGinnis v. Marlborough-Hudson Gas Co. 220 Mass. 575, L.R.A.1915D, 1080, 108 N. E. 364.

To subject a proprietor or owner to liability for damages caused by acts of an independent contractor, there must be negligence of such owner.

Hughbanks v. Boston Invest. Co. 92 Iowa, 267, 60 N. W. 640; Humpton v. Unterkircher, 97 Iowa, 509, 68 N. W. 776, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 595; Kelleher v. Schmitt & H. Mfg. Co. 122 Iowa, 639, 98 N. When the property destroyed or injured is so closely connected with the real estate on which it stands, or to which it is attached, that it has no value separate and independent of the real estate, or the injury is to the soil itself, the measure of damages is the difference in value between the real estate before the injury and after it.

Mr. Hazen I. Sawyer also for appellant.

Messrs. Hughes & McCoid, for appellee:

The party making use of powerful explosives will be liable for the damage approximately and naturally resulting therefrom, irrespectively of the question of negligence or want of skill in the blasting operations, and especially so when such blastings are carried on in a populous city or near the owner's property, and no license is obtained from the city authorities or otherwise to so blast.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is, and during the time mentioned in his petition was, the owner of two lots with buildings and improvements thereon in the city of Keokuk, Iowa. The defendant, having been granted authority therefor by act of Congress, has been engaged in constructing a dam across the Mississippi river at that place for the purpose of providing electric power to be sold to users thereof within the area reached or to be reached by its cables and supply lines. Among other things, the plan of this improvement contemplated the erection of a power house in connection with the dam at a point about 1,000 feet east of the west bank of the river on which the city is built. It also contemplated the construction of certain locks, spillways, and a canal. To do this work according to the plan required the blasting and removal of a very large amount of rock from its natural bed under the river, much of it to the depth of 25 feet. The work of this rock excavation was let to a contractor, the Hydraulic Engineering Company, which performed the service. The work was of such magnitude as to occupy two years or more in its completion, in the course of which heavy blasts were fired from day to day. The property owned by plaintiff is situated upon the bluff or highlands, one tract being four blocks and the other fourteen blocks west of the river.

In his petition plaintiff alleges that the blasting by a series of violent explosions was continued throughout a period of two years or more, and were of such powerful character that the concussion or jar thereof broke the glass in the windows of his buildings, cracked the walls, loosened and injured the plastering, and otherwise injured those structures, and that the damage suffered therefrom was $3,000. He characterizes the acts of defendant as wrongful and negligent, and demands judgment for the recovery of his alleged damages. The defendant's answer is a denial of all the allegations of the petition.

The evidence introduced in the case is not presented by the abstract, except by way of a brief general recital of the matters we have already stated, and the further statement that both plaintiff and defendant introduced evidence tending to support their respective claims under the issues made by the pleadings; that there was no proof that rock or other material were cast upon plaintiff's premises by the blasts; and that the injury complained of was caused solely "from the air concussion or earth vibration" set in action by the explosion of the blasts.

The issues having been submitted to a jury, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for damages assessed at $500. A motion by defendant to set aside the verdict and for new trial having been overruled, judgment was entered for plaintiff for $500 and costs, and defendant appeals.

I. The initial proposition by appellant is that in its charge submitting the case to the jury the court erred in failing to instruct upon the law of negligence as applicable to this controversy. It is said the plaintiff charged negligence in the blasting, that such allegation was material to his right to recover damages, and without proof of the want of due care on defendant's part a verdict for plaintiff cannot be sustained.

It is true the plaintiff did charge the blasting was done negligently, and, if we are to hold that a showing of negligence was essential to his right to recover, then the exception is well taken, and appellant is entitled to a reversal. But our practice act provides (Code, § 3639) that a party shall not be required to prove more than is necessary to entitle him to relief asked for, and if in this case plaintiff was not required to allege negligence in order to state a cause of action, and did allege facts other than negligence upon which, if true, he was entitled to damages, and introduced evidence tending to support the same, then the failure to prove negligence would not be fatal to his right of recovery, and the failure of the court to instruct upon the subject of negligence would not be prejudicial error. Engle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 661, 37 N. W. 6, 42 N. W. 512; Swiney v. American Exp. Co. 144 Iowa, 348, 115 N. W. 212, 122 N. W. 957; Ware Cattle Co. v. Anderson, 107 Iowa, 234, 77 N. W. 1026. In the case at bar the plaintiff alleged that the acts complained of were wrongful as well as negligent, and under the rule above stated our inquiry is reduced to the single question whether injuries to property caused solely by jar, concussion, or vibration of earth and air produced or set in motion by blasting constitute, under the circumstances stated, any wrong for which the law affords a remedy.

This question has had the attention of the courts in several other jurisdictions, but thus far we have had no occasion to pass upon it in the direct and concrete form presented by the record in the present case. An examination of the precedents develops a divergence of judicial opinion. There is a class of cases which, according to appellant's contention, hold that without allegation and proof of negligence damages of the kind suffered by the appellee herein cannot be recovered, while others adhere to the doctrine that a showing of negligence is not essential to the liability of a party who uses the dangerous agency of powerful explosives in such place or in such manner that the natural and proximate result thereof is injury to the person or property of another. Some of the cases cited by appellant appear to go to the full extent of the rule which appellant asks us to approve. For example, the Alabama court, in Bessemer Coal, Iron & Land Co. v. Doak, 152 Ala. 166, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 389, 44 So. 627, after some discussion of the authorities, indicates its approval of the rule that "if one, in blasting upon his own lands, invades the premises of his neighbor by throwing stones and debris thereon, he is liable for the resulting injury, but for any other injury, such as may result from the mere concussion of the atmosphere, sound, or otherwise, there is no liability, unless it is shown that the work was done negligently, and that the injury was the result of negligence, and not the result of blasting according to the usual methods and with reasonable care."

Such seems also to be the rule in New York. Booth v. Rome, W. & O. Terminal R. Co. 140 N. Y. 267, 24 L.R.A. 105, 37 Am. St. Rep. 552, 35 N. E. 592; Benner v. Atlantic Dredging Co. 134 N. Y. 156, 17 L.R.A. 220, 30 Am. St. Rep. 649, 31 N. E. 328; Holland House Co. v. Baird, 169 N. Y. 136, 62 N. E. 149, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 166; Page v. Dempsey, 184 N. Y. 245, 77 N. E. 9, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 135. The proposition also finds some support in Simon v. Henry, 62 N. J. L. 486, 41 Atl. 692, and in MacGinnis v. Marlborough-Hudson Gas Co. 220 Mass. 575, L.R.A.1915D, 1080, 108 N. E. 364. The Michigan case cited by appellant (Mitchell v. Prange, 110 Mich. 78, 34 L.R.A. 182, 64 Am. St. Rep. 329, 67 N. W. 1096) does not appear to us to be in point.

It will be noted upon reading the cases to which we have referred and others of their class that, with few exceptions, they refer either to the effect of the use of explosives under the authority of or contract with the general government, or in the construction of railways or canals by corporations endowed by the state with the power of eminent domain, or in excavating streets or highways under the authority of the state or local municipality, and, without conceding what is claimed by way of exemption from liability, even in such cases it may well be admitted that the effect of such circumstances is a question upon which there is room for plausible argument in support of the theory. The appellant herein, though clothed with license or consent from the Federal government to dam the Mississippi river, a navigable stream, is not in position to claim the immunities, if any, of a government contractor, and, although it proposes to supply electricity to the public within the territory which its lines may cover, it is to all intents and purposes a strictly private enterprise for private profit, and, even though it be clothed with power of eminent domain, it does not include authority to take or to destroy private property without compensation.

That what we may call the New York rule is not in harmony with the greater weight of authority is, we think, clearly demonstrable. The following are illustrative cases:

In a recent Ohio case the city of Cincinnati had let a contract to excavate a tunnel under its streets for use in supplying the city with water. A lot owner brought action against the city and the contractor, alleging that in doing the work high-power explosives were employed, with the result that the concussions and vibrations so produced injured and destroyed plaintiff's property. No negligence was alleged, and the defendants demurred to the petition. The trial court sustained the demurrer, but on appeal to the supreme court the ruling was reversed. The court states the question to be whether the owner of property may make use of powerful explosives on his own premises in the accomplishment of a lawful purpose, provided he uses due care, notwithstanding the necessary or natural or probable result thereof is to injure or destroy adjacent property. This, it will be seen, is precisely the proposition we have now before us. In sustaining the right of action the court says: "There are, of course, two very important considerations to be kept in mind in the disposition of a question of this character: First, to give to the owner the largest liberty possible in the use, occupation, and improvement of his own property consistent with the rights of others and the right to employ modern methods and machinery in accomplishing the improvements desired; second, that one may not use his own property to the injury of any legal right of another. L.R.A.1916D.

This maxim of the common law, 'Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas,' is so well established and so universally recognized that it needs neither argument nor citation of authority in its support. But it must be conceded that this is no longer the law if the owner of a lot may employ such means in the improvement of his property as will naturally and necessarily result in the destruction of adjoining property. . . . If the means employed will, in the very nature of things, injure and destroy his neighbor's property, notwithstanding the highest possible care is used in the handling of the destructive agency, the result to the adjoining property is just as disastrous as if negligence had intervened. If one may knowingly destroy his neighbor's property in the improvement of his own, it is little consolation to the neighbor to know that his property was destroyed with due care and in a scientific manner." Louden v. Cincinnati, 90 Ohio St. 144, L.R.A.1915E, 356, 106 N. E. 970.

In a very similar case in Illinois, where the use of dynamite in constructing a tunnel caused vibrations and jars from which the plaintiff's building was injured, the court distinctly declines to follow the New York rule, and adopts the rule of the Ohio cases. Fitz Simons & C. Co. v. Braun, 199 Ill. 390, 59 L.R.A. 421, 65 N. E. 249, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 9. To the same effect, see Colton v. Onderdonk, 69 Cal. 155, 58 Am. Rep. 556, 10 Pac. 395; Hickey v. McCabe, 30 R. I. 346, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 425, 75 Atl. 404, 19 Ann. Cas. 783; Carman v. Steubenville & I. R. Co. 4 Ohio St. 399; Gossett v. Southern R. Co. 115 Tenn. 376, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 97, 112 Am. St. Rep. 846, 89 S. W. 737; Chicago v. Murdock, 212 Ill. 9, 103 Am. St. Rep. 221, 72 N. E. 46; Longtin v. Persell, 30 Mont. 306, 65 L.R.A. 655, 104 Am. St. Rep. 723, 76 Pac. 699, 2 Ann. Cas. 198, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 113; Bradford Glycerine Co. v. St. Mary's Woolen Mfg. Co. 60 Ohio St. 560, 45 L.R.A. 658, 71 Am. St. Rep. 740, 54 N. E. 528, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 674; Tiffin v. McCormack, 34 Ohio St. 638, 32 Am. Rep. 408, 2 Mor. Min. Rep. 194; Cahill v. Eastman, 18 Minn. 324, 10 Am. Rep. 184, Gil. 292.

The rule as deduced by Thompson in his work on Negligence, § 764, is stated to be that recovery may be had for injuries done by blasting: (1) Where dirt and stones are thrown by the blast upon the property, irrespective of the question of negligence; (2) where the work of blasting is done in a situation where it is necessarily dangerous to persons or property, whether the injury proceeds from the impact of rocks thrown or from atmospheric concussion, irrespective of the care or skill used; (3) in all other cases liability will attach to the person or corporation carrying on the dangerous employment where the work has been negligently done. Even the court of New York has said it is "an elementary principle in reference to private rights that every individual is entitled to the undisturbed possession and lawful enjoyment of his own property. The mode of enjoyment is necessarily limited by the rights of others." This rule the court applied to a recovery of damages for injuries resulting from blasting done in the construction of a canal. Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279. In so doing the court says: "The use of land by the proprietor is not . . . an absolute right, but qualified and limited by the higher right of others to the lawful possession of their property. To this possession the law prohibits all direct injury, without regard to its extent or the motives of the aggressor. A man may prosecute such business as he chooses upon his premises, but he cannot erect a nuisance to the annoyance of the adjoining proprietor, even for the purpose of a lawful trade. . . . He may excavate a canal, but he cannot cast the dirt or stones upon the land of his neighbor, either by human agency or the force of gunpowder. If he cannot construct the work without the adoption of such means, he must abandon that mode of using his property, or be held responsible for all damages resulting therefrom."

He will not be allowed to accomplish a legal object by unlawful means.

The same court has distinctly and repeatedly held that one who by blasting casts rock or other substances upon the property of another is liable for the injury so done without regard to the question of negligence, and that the plea that blasting is a necessary operation, or that the work is being done under contract with the state, is no defense. Sullivan v. Dunham, 161 N. Y. 290, 47 L.R.A. 715, 76 Am. St. Rep. 274, 55 N. E. 923, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 126; St. Peter v. Denison, 58 N. Y. 416, 17 Am. Rep. 258. These decisions that court has often reaffirmed, and still declares its adherence thereto, but seeks to distinguish them from the line of its other decisions above cited, by pointing out that in the Cohoes Case and in others following it the injury was done by casting debris upon the plaintiff's premises, while in cases of the kind we have now before us the injury complained of results from concussion of the atmosphere or from vibrations of the earth. The former, it is said, constitutes a physical invasion, a trespass, upon the plaintiff's property, while the latter does not. The deduction is neither obvious nor convincing. Phys. L.R.A. 1916D.

ical invasion of the property of another does not necessarily imply an actual breaking or entering of the plaintiff's close by the wrongdoer in person, or casting upon his premises any particular kind of missile or other particular thing or substance. The employment of force of any kind which, when so put in operation, extends its energy into the premises of another to their material injury, and renders them uninhabitable, is as much a physical invasion as if the wrongdoer had entered thereon in person and by overpowering strength had cast the owner into the street. If, for example, a person interests himself in solar phenomena, and, while experimenting with a powerful sunglass, he accidentally focuses the instrument upon some inflammable material on the lot of his next-door neighbor, starting a blaze which results in injury and loss to the latter, can it be said there was no trespass, no actual invasion of the neighbor's premises? Or suppose one owning land bordering upon a small lake or pond finds that some desired improvement requires the blasting or cutting down of a rock bluff standing at the edge of the water. To accomplish this he places a powerful blast, fires it, and casts such a body of material into the pond as to create a miniature tidal wave, which, rolling across to the other side, does material injury to the property of another riparian owner. Is there no trespass or physical invasion of the neighbor's premises? It has often been held that the casting or discharge of noxious vapors or gases into the air which, spreading abroad, invade the home or place of business of another, constitutes an actual wrong. In a legal sense how does an injury inflicted by the act of one who casts a rock against his neighbor's house, or destroys his property by turning loose the ungoverned energy of water in motion, differ from an injury caused by one who voluntarily imparts destructive force and energy to the air, or who by the use of the almost limitless powers of modern explosives creates a little earthquake? On this subject the Rhode Island court says: "An act which in many cases is in itself lawful becomes unlawful when by it damage has accrued to the property of another. And it would make no material difference whether that damage, resulting proximately and naturally from the act of blasting by the defendant, was caused by rocks thrown against [plaintiff's] dwelling house or a concussion of the air around it. . . . In such case one who thus causes dangerous forces to pass through another's property should be held liable for the damage directly resulting therefrom. And there is no more reason for requiring that negligence be shown

Speaking of the attempted distinction to which we have referred, the court in Louden v. Cincinnati, supra, says: "We are unable to distinguish between a case where a fragment of rock or a portion of the soil is thrown onto an adjoining property, and a case where the force of an explosion is transmitted through the soil and substratum, jarring, cracking, and breaking it, destroying the . . . foundation of the building, and wrecking the building . . . by a concussion of air around it, thereby doing far more injury than a fragment of rock could do. It is a distinction without a difference. If this terrific force may be set in motion by the owner of one parcel of ground, with full knowledge upon his part that such force will invade, damage, and destroy the property of the adjoining proprietor, what difference does it make how this force accomplishes the result that, in the very nature of things, must have been anticipated? Is not a concussion of the air, and jarring, breaking, and cracking the ground with such force as to wreck the buildings thereon, as much an invasion of the rights of the owner as the hurling of a missile thereon? If there is any difference whatever, it is purely technical, and ought to find no favor with the courts. Certainly the application of a force sufficient to crack the surface of the land, . . . to destroy the foundations of buildings, to break windows, and throw down chimneys is a direct invasion of property rights."

Likewise in the cited Illinois case, Fitz Simons & C. Co. v. Braun, 199 Ill. 390, 59 L.R.A. 421, 65 N. E. 249, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 9, the court, referring to another case, said: "It is true that in that case there was an actual invasion of the property; . . . but liability . . . caused by actual invasion of the property, or by the concussion or vibration of the earth or air, is within the doctrine there announced. If one who, for his own purposes and profit, undertakes to perform a work by means of explosives inherently dangerous to the property of another, should be held liable for an injury occasioned by any substance cast by the explosives on the property of such other, it is only by the merest subtlety of reasoning he should be held not liable to respond for equal or greater damage caused by the concussion of the air or of the earth."

The rule thus affirmed seems to be the rule of reason, and to have the support of the better considered precedents.

The consideration urged upon us in oral argument, that appellant is engaged in the construction of a great work of general utility and that the laws should be liberally construed to promote its purpose, is not without weight, where it can be indulged without sacrifice of principle. But, important as it may be that business progress and development shall not be fettered by over-technical interpretation of the laws affecting them, it is, to say the least, of equal importance that the courts maintain unimpaired all our constitutional and legal guaranties of personal and property rights. The individual citizen may be deprived of his home or other property by the proper exercise of the power of eminent domain, but it ought not to be said it can be lawfully destroyed without compensation, in the interest of a mere business enterprise, simply because such enterprise is of great magnitude and general public interest.

The Iowa cases cited by appellant are not out of harmony with the views here expressed. Slatten v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 29 Iowa, 149, 4 Am. Rep. 205, quoted from by counsel, is not at all in point. The act there complained of involved no invasion of or physical injury to the plaintiff's property. The defendant, acting under grant of authority from the city, had constructed a bridge across the Des Moines river, and in building the necessary approach had raised the grade of the street in front of plaintiff's hotel, and for this he sought to recover damages. Under the statute as it then stood it was held that no recovery could be had except upon allegation and proof that the authority given to construct the bridge and approach had been exercised in a negligent or improper manner. The mere statement of the facts makes clear the inapplicability of the precedent to the question before us. Had the defendant in that case made use of some high explosive in the course of its work, and by the jar or concussion so produced shattered the walls, windows, and foundations of plaintiff's hotel, a very different proposition would have been presented to the court, and we may well assume that recovery of damages would not have been denied. Equally foreign to the discussion is Walker v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 658, 33 N. W. 224. There the defendant, as a common carrier, was transporting a shipment of giant powder, which exploded, doing injury to plaintiff's property in that vicinity, and it was held that defendant could be made liable only upon a showing of negligence on its part. The defendant, as a common carrier, was acting in the line of its public duty in receiving and transporting the car with its load, and if, in so doing, it exercised all the care reasonably required under the circumstances, it was not liable for the results of an explosion not intentionally occasioned and occurring without its agency or its fault. The other precedents cited from our decisions are all of the same general character. None of them announce a rule or principle affecting the soundness or propriety of the rulings or judgment from which this appeal has been taken. The nearest in point perhaps are cases like Ochiltree v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 631, 62 N. W. 7, and others of that nature, where the wrong charged was the sounding of a steam whistle or the operation of a gasoline engine near the highway and the consequent frightening of teams. The obvious difference between these cases and the one at bar is in the fact that use of high explosives is inherently dangerous, and, when used in quantities sufficient to create violent disturbance of the earth and air, injury naturally results, or may reasonably be anticipated, to property within the area of such disturbance, without regard to the care exercised in doing the work or in guarding against its destructive effects; while with the exercise of due care in operating an engine or blowing a whistle, with like measure of care on the part of drivers, little, if any, danger is to be anticipated from the frightening of teams. The trial court did not err in failing to charge the jury that proof of negligence was necessary to plaintiff's recovery.

II. It is conceded that the work of making the rock excavation and the blasting incident thereto were done by a contractor to whom the job had been let by the appellant, and this, counsel argue, brings the case within the rule which exempts the owner from liability for the act or fault of an independent contractor. The rule thus invoked is of undoubted soundness as related to a proper case involving consideration of the law of negligence; but holding, as we do, that defendant's liability is not bottomed upon a charge of negligence in the ordinary sense of that word, the fact that the work was let to and done by a contractor is not a matter of decisive significance. That the work let to the contractor contemplated that it should be done by blasting is not disputed, and the whole defense and the argument in support thereof assume the necessity and propriety of the employment of explosives in such construction. The work being intrinsically dangerous, and, even when properly done, liable to be attended with injurious, if not destructive, results to buildings and property in the city in the immediate neighborhood of which the blasting was to be done, defendant could not relieve itself from liability by delegating the work to a contractor. Prowell v. Waterloo, 144 Iowa, 689, 123 N. W. 346. It is nowhere suggested or shown that the contractors did other than the very thing they were employed and expected to do, and for any actionable injury resulting therefrom under such circumstances the owner is always liable. Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 428, 17 L. ed. 304; Robbins v. Chicago, 4 Wall. 679, 18 L. ed. 432; St. Paul Water Co. v. Ware, 16 Wall. 566, 21 L. ed. 485. In the last-mentioned case the court says: "If the contractor does the thing which he is employed to do, the employer is as responsible for the thing as if he had done it himself, but if the act which is the subject of complaint is purely collateral to the matter contracted to be done, and arises indirectly in the course of the employment, 'the employer is not liable because he never authorized the work to be done.'"

Again in the same case it is said that where the "injury results . . . from the acts which the contractor agreed and was authorized to do, the person who employs the contractor and authorizes him to do those acts is equally liable to the injured party."

Indeed, it would be a singular perversion of justice for the court to say that where an act, if done by the owner himself, renders him liable to a person thereby injured, without regard to any question of negligence, he may escape such consequences by the simple expedient of employing a contractor to do it for him. Dealing with a case where a contractor, in doing a public work for a city, necessarily used explosives, exercising therein all reasonable care, the city was held liable for the resulting injury to adjacent property. Joliet v. Harwood, 86 Ill. 110, 29 Am. Rep. 17. In disposing of the question the court says: "The work which the contractor was required by the city to do was intrinsically dangerous, however carefully or skillfully done. The right of recovery . . . does not rest upon a charge of negligence on the part of the contractor; it rests upon the fact that the city caused work to be done which was intrinsically dangerous,—the natural (though not the necessary) consequence of which was the injury to plaintiff's property."

The same rule was applied in Fitz Simons & C. Co. v. Braun, 199 Ill. 390, 59 L.R.A. 421, 65 N. E. 249, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 9; Louden v. Cincinnati, 90 Ohio St. 144, L.R.A.1915E, 356, 106 N. E. 970; Hawver v. Whalen, 49 Ohio St. 69, 14 L.R.A. 828, 29 N. E. 1049; Southern Ohio R. Co. v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207, 7 L.R.A. 701, 24 N. E. 269; Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. 39 Ohio St. 476. The true rule is well stated in the last-cited case as follows: "The employer cannot relieve himself from liability by contracting with others for the performance of work, where the necessary or probable effect of the performance of the work would injure third persons."

The trial court correctly held that the rule exempting an owner from liability for the negligence of an independent contractor is not applicable to the instant case.

III. The court instructed the jury that, if found entitled to recover, the plaintiff's measure of damages was the reasonable cost of restoring the injured buildings to the condition they were in immediately before the injury thereto. This is said to be an incorrect statement, and that the true measure is the difference between the fair value of the property immediately before and immediately after such injury. The measure of damage for injury to real property is not invariable, and there may be circumstances under which either of the rules stated would be applicable. The rule stated by appellant is more often applied where the damage is permanent, or cannot well be expressed in specific items of injury capable of easy repair or remedy, but does affect in some substantial degree the value of the entire property as a unit. But where the injury is susceptible of remedy at moderate expense, and the cost of restoring it may be shown with reasonable certainty, the rule given the jury by the trial court is entirely proper. Shrieve v. Stokes, 8 B. Mon. 453, 48 Am. Dec. 401; Fitz Simons & C. Co. v. Braun, 199 Ill. 390, 59 L.R.A. 421, 65 N. E. 249, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 9; Graessle v. Carpenter, 70 Iowa, 166, 30 N. E. 392; McMahon v. Dubuque, 107 Iowa, 63, 70 Am. St. Rep. 143, 77 N. W. 517, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 147.

IV. Exceptions to the court's instructions are based principally upon appellant's theory that its liability, if any, is for negligence, and upon the idea that the rule as to negligence of independent contractors is applicable to this case. The court has already passed upon those propositions adversely to the position of appellant, and they need not be further considered.

There is no error shown calling for a reversal of the judgment appealed from, and it is affirmed.

The addition of a plant for making paper boxes to one in which wooden ones have been manufactured is not within the operation of a tax exemption of any manufacturing establishment which shall be permanently located and operated within the city.

Hurt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the appellant against the tax receiver of the city of Louisville, to enjoin the collection from it of the taxes levied by the city upon a portion of the real estate and personal property owned and used by it in the establishment conducted by it for the manufacturing of boxes, the portion of the property which it seeks to have declared exempt from taxation being that portion used by it in the manufacturing of paper boxes, the petition and amended petition, in substance, alleging that the appellant had been engaged for several years, previous to April, 1913, in manufacturing wooden boxes, and that the real estate owned and used by it in the manufacturing of wooden boxes had at some time previous to April, 1913, enjoyed an exemption from taxation for city purposes for five years, under and by virtue of the ordinance of the city upon that subject, that proposing to add the business of manufacturing paper boxes to its operations, it had erected a building in addition to the one used by it in manufacturing wooden boxes, upon the same lot which it used in manufacturing wooden boxes, and installed in it the machinery necessary for the making of paper boxes, and commenced to make paper boxes in April, 1913; that it had not theretofore engaged in making paper boxes, and that no one in the city had theretofore manufactured solid fiber paper boxes; that the making of paper boxes for commercial purposes had only been a manufacturing business since within ten years last past; that it used the additional building and machinery therein exclusively for the making of paper boxes; that it had secured the services of a new manager of its business, who knew how to manufacture paper boxes, and employed in the business of manufacturing paper boxes about one third as many men as it employed in making wooden boxes, and that it employed in making wooden boxes between 300 and 400 men; that it had erected a new manufacturing establishment and engaged in a new industry in the city, and was entitled, under § 2980a, Ky. Stat., and the ordinance of the city, which was approved on July 29, 1898, to have the property owned and used by it in the manufacturing of paper boxes exempted from taxation for city purposes for five years, as provided in the statute and ordinance, L.R.A.1916D.

supra; that in deciding upon a location for this addition to its business, it had considered locating it at Baltimore, Maryland, and Richmond, Virginia, as well as in the city of Louisville, and prayed as relief that the tax collector of the city be enjoined from the collection of such part of the tax bill as was assessed upon the property used by it in manufacturing paper boxes. A general demurrer was interposed to the petition and the petition as amended, which the court below sustained, and adjudged that the petition as amended be dismissed, to which the appellant excepted and appealed to this court.

The question here to be determined is, Did the petition, as amended, state facts upon which it was entitled to the relief sought?

The portion of § 170 of the Constitution which is applicable to the question for determination provides as follows: "The general assembly may authorize any incorporated city or town to exempt manufacturing establishments from municipal taxation for a period not exceeding five years, as an inducement to their location."

Section 2980a, Ky. Stat. adopted in pursuance to the constitutional provision, supra, is as follows: "That the general council shall have power by ordinance to exempt from municipal taxation, for a period not exceeding five years, manufacturing establishments, as an inducement to their location within the city limits."

The general council of the city exercised the power granted it by the statute, supra, by an ordinance which was approved, as alleged in the petition, on July 29, 1898, and which provided, in substance, that in order to induce the location of more manufacturing establishments within the city limits, such establishment owned and operated by any person, firm, or corporation which shall have been, after the passage of the act authorizing the ordinance, permanently located and conducted within the city, shall be exempt from taxation for five years after the location and commencement of manufacturing thereat, upon all the property employed and used in conducting the business of such manufacturing establishment.

This court has several times construed the ordinance and statute as applied to different manufacturing establishments. In the case of Continental Tobacco Co. v. Louisville, 123 Ky. 173, 94 S. W. 11, the American Tobacco Company and John Finzer & Brother, were corporations each of which was engaged in manufacturing plug and smoking tobacco. They were sold to the Continental Tobacco Company, a separate and distinct corporation from the former owners. The purchaser invested new capital and new machinery, and employed more men in the business, but it was held that it only amounted to an enlargement of the old plants and the addition of capital to going concerns, and the Continental Tobacco Company was not entitled to an exemption from taxation, under the provisions of the ordinance. It therefore follows that a mere change of ownership of a going concern and the addition of new capital, machinery, and a new management of the concern by the new owner, does not constitute such a manufacturing establishment, within the city limits, after the passage of the ordinance, which will be entitled to the exemption from taxation provided for in the ordinance. The court in the case said: "The object and purpose of the exemption of manufacturing establishments from the payment of taxes for a certain period was to induce the location of new establishments in the various cities of the commonwealth, to induce persons of capital and enterprise and business capacity to invest their money so as to build up the cities of the state."

In the case of Jones Bros. v. Louisville, 142 Ky. 759, 135 S. W. 301, the appellant was a corporation engaged in the manufacturing of cider, vinegar, molasses, and fruit products. It was created by the consolidation of three other corporations, one of which was a manufacturer of cider, vinegar, and fruit products, another of syrups and molasses, and the other of canned goods. Each of these corporations had enjoyed exemption from taxation under the ordinance under which the exemption is claimed in the case at bar. Two of the corporations were going concerns at the time of the merger. The corporation created by the merger increased the size of the plant and put more capital into the business, and manufactured all the products previously manufactured by the three concerns, and in addition made preserves, which had not theretofore been manufactured by either of them. This court held that it was not entitled to the exemption, and that it was not such a new manufacturing establishment as was contemplated by the ordinance. The court in the opinion said: "It is manifest that the sole object of the constitutional provision and statute in question is to exempt from taxation, for a period of five years, new manufacturing concerns, provided they invest their capital and locate their plants within the limits of the city offering by ordinance the inducement afforded by such exemption."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville, 143 Ky. 258, 136 S. W. 611, the appellant had for many years maintained its principal repair and construction shops, in which were employed about 1,400 men, at a certain point in the city of Louisville, but in 1902 it commenced building new shops in another portion of the city, and occupied them in 1905. The old shops were then abandoned. The new shops were of the newest and latest model, and operated by electric power, on account of which nearly all the machinery in the old shops had to be abandoned and new machinery provided for the new shops. The old employees were kept, and in addition several hundred new men were given employment in the new shops. The character of the work done in the new and old shops was substantially the same, except that in the new shops locomotives were built, a work which the old shops did not do. The claim of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for exemption from taxation of its new shops and machinery therein was denied by the court, which held that the city had not acquired any new business, within the meaning of the exemption ordinance.

"It has merely the exchange or substitution of a new and enlarged shop for an old shop. The statute evidently contemplates the bringing to the city of Louisville a business that had not theretofore existed there, . . . a 'new enterprise,' a 'new manufacturing establishment.'"

In the Kentucky Electric Co. v. Buechell, 146 Ky. 660, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 907, 143 S. W. 58, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 714, there was no question but that the enterprise was a new one in the city, but the decision in that case turned upon the question as to whether the business was a manufacturing establishment or not, and sheds no light upon the controversy here.

In Victor Cotton Oil Co. v. Louisville, 149 Ky. 149, 148 S. W. 10, a corporation which owned a factory in Louisville ceased operations in March and turned over its property to an agent to be sold. In a month or two several of its stockholders, with some other persons, organized a new corporation, and in October following purchased the plant of the old corporation, giving stock in the new corporation for it. The claim of the new corporation for exemption from taxation was denied, the court saying: "It was not contemplated by either the Constitution, the statute, or the ordinance that manufacturing establishments already established in the city shall be exempt from taxation for five years, when they change hands. . . . It does not include manufacturing establishments already in the city, although for any reason not in operation."

In Louisville v. New York Baking Co. 151 Ky. 758, 152 S. W. 980, which was a claim for exemption from taxation under the ordinance, supra, the court said: "The plain purpose of the constitutional provision, as well as the statute and the ordinance, is to induce the location of new manufacturing enterprises in the city. Neither contemplates the exemption from taxation of manufacturing establishments already located in the city, which may be enlarged. . . . To bring itself within the constitutional provision and the ordinance, a concern must show that a new manufacturing business has been established in the city, not that an old business has been enlarged and improved or modified in some particulars."

In B. F. McCormick Lumber Co. v. Winchester, 155 Ky. 496, 159 S. W. 997, the Reliance Manufacturing Company owned a planing mill in Winchester, at which it dressed rough lumber and sold it at wholesale. It sold the plant to the McCormick Lumber Company, which was composed of persons who did not reside in the city. The new owners partly rebuilt the structure on the premises, built new buildings, and installed new machinery, different from the old machinery in use, and engaged in the business of manufacturing all kinds of lumber, and selling their products altogether by retail. It did not acquire any trade or custom by its purchase, because the old corporation had no retail trade. This court held that the new establishment was not exempt from taxation, upon the ground that no new business enterprise had been established in or brought into the city. The McCormick Company was simply continuing the planing mill business, which had been conducted there by the Reliance Manufacturing Company.

It will be observed that from the foregoing adjudication of this court a mere enlargement of an already existing manufacturing establishment, in the way of the addition of new buildings, new and additional machinery, new processes for manufacturing, new capital invested in the enterprise, a new management, the addition of other employees, or the acquisition by new persons of the ownership of an existing enterprise, do not make of it a manufacturing establishment which entitles its owners to have it exempted from taxation, under the provisions of the ordinance, statute, and section of the Constitution, supra. So, the question to be determined here is whether or not the manufacturing of paper boxes by the appellant is a new manufacturing establishment, within the meaning of the ordinance, or is it a mere enlargement of the manufacturing establishment which appellant was already conducting in the city? In the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville, supra, the company, in its old shops, did not manufacture locomotives, and did so in its new shops, having to use new and different machinery in its manufacturing processes from that used in the old shops. Both shops did brasswork and flagging, made castings and froggings, prepared woodwork for use in repairing and building cars, both had boiler shops, machine shops, pattern shops, and foundries, and it was held that when the work done in the old and new shops was not materially different. In Jones Bros. v. Louisville, 142 Ky. 759, 135 S. W. 301, the new corporation made a preserve, which was not made by the old corporations, which by their merger created the new, but it was held that this was not a new industry, but a mere enlargement of the old business. In B. F. McCormick Lumber Co. v. Winchester, supra, it was held that the manufacturing of all kinds of woodwork, both for the exterior and interior of buildings, was not a different manufacturing establishment from the one owned by the Reliance Manufacturing Company, which only dressed rough lumber to be sold at wholesale. It seems that in the cases, supra, the products made by the enlargement of the manufacturing establishments were not different in a generic sense from the output of the older establishment. In the case at bar, the appellant was engaged in the manufacturing of wooden boxes. It had enjoyed an exemption from city taxation on the real estate used and its entire plant, under the ordinance, supra. Its management has never changed neither has its ownership. It has added the making of paper boxes to its business, at the same place and upon the same lot. It necessarily must install the machinery necessary to make paper boxes. Is not the making of paper boxes simply an expansion of its business of making boxes? Where the new business is merely an expansion of the old business, manifestly the exemption ought not to be allowed.

An exemption from taxation is a special privilege, and not enjoyed by all as a matter of common right, and the claimant of it, as well as others who make claims to special privileges, must submit to having the statutes and ordinances under which the privilege is claimed strictly construed, so as not to extend their terms as granting such privileges beyond the letter of such ordinances and statutes. Kilgus v. Orphanage of Good Shepherd, 94 Ky. 444, 22 S. W. 750; Middlesboro v. New South Brewing & Ice Co. 108 Ky. 351, 56 S. W. 427; German Bank v. Louisville, 108 Ky. 382, 56 S. W. 504.

It is concluded that the making of paper boxes and the additional building and machinery for it is not a new manufacturing establishment, induced to locate in the city of Louisville by the provisions of the ordinance, supra, and therefore exempt from taxation, but is a mere enlargement and expansion of the establishment for making boxes which appellant already had.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Annotation—Taxes: extension of exemption to addition to, or enlargement of, manufacturing plant.

Generally, as to taxation of manufacturing corporations in the United States, see note to Williams v. Warren (1903) 64 L.R.A. 33.

Constitutional provisions, ordinances, and statutes exempting manufacturing concerns from taxation are ordinarily designed to encourage the location of new industries by aiding them to make a beginning. Consequently, the conclusion of the court in MENGEL BOX CO. v. SEA, ante, 108, that the mere enlargement of an already existing manufacturing establishment, in the way of the addition of new buildings, new and additional machinery, new processes for manufacturing, new capital invested in the enterprise, a new management, and the addition of other employees, etc., does not make it a new manufacturing establishment within the operation of the tax exemption in question,—is not only sustained by Continental Tobacco Co. v. Louisville (1906) 123 Ky. 173, 94 S. W. 11; Jones Bros. v. Louisville (1911) 142 Ky. 759, 135 S. W. 301; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville (1911) 143 Ky. 258, 136 S. W. 611; Victor Cotton Oil Co. v. Louisville (1912) 149 Ky. 149, 148 S. W. 10; Louisville v. New York Baking Co. (1913) 151 Ky. 758, 152 S. W. 980; B. F. McCormick Lumber Co. v. Winchester (1913) 155 Ky. 496, 159 S. W. 997, cited by the court in its opinion, but also by the purpose of the law creating the particular exemption in question, as well as that of such laws generally.

In addition to these decisions, it has also been decided that a statute exempting the buildings and machinery of certain factories from taxation "during their erection and for one year after they commence operations" does not apply to new machinery and new buildings for its accommodation added to a factory which has been in operation for a number of years. Tallassee Mfg. Co. v. Spigener (1873) 49 Ala. 262. The court said: "The purpose of the law was to aid the manufactories referred to to make a beginning, not to aid them after they had been in operation for a number of years. The latter is the case made in this bill. The factory in this case had been in successful operation for a number of years, and the machinery sought to be exempted was new machinery added to the old machinery, and the buildings erected were for the accommodation of this new machinery. The exemption of such additions goes beyond both the language and the policy of the act."

And in Baugh, K. & Co. v. Ryan (1874) 51 Ala. 212, it was decided that a statute for the encouragement of certain industries in the state of Alabama was intended to exempt from taxation, for the period prescribed, not factories, buildings, machinery, etc., already erected and in use, but such as were then in the process of erection, and such as might be afterwards erected within the period specified; and that the 1st section of the statute, which contained an evident mistake in the use of the words "before erected and used," must be read as if those words were omitted, or as if the word "not" were inserted before them. The court said: "These words, as they stand in the section, present a disjointed connection. By reference to the senate journal, an amendment of the bill is seen to have been made by inserting between the words 'machinery' and 'erection' the words 'in process of erection before and.' It thus appears that a mistake has been made, though it is not plain what was the mistake. The evident purpose of the law was to encourage the investment of money in such pursuits, and also in shipbuilding. The present loss of revenue would be more than recovered after the expiration of ten years; and if such works were not erected, the law would have no application. It was certainly not intended to exempt from taxation works already erected, and, perhaps, in use for more than ten years. The anxiety to increase the resources of the state is suggestive of some extreme necessity for so doing, lying in the prostration of the present industries of the state. It would have been in the highest degree inequitable to have cast what was considered a burden of taxation from any of the existing industries onto others equally depressed; whereas, it was eminently proper to give a respite from taxation to new undertakings. We decide that the act should be read as if the words 'before erected and used,' in the 1st section, were entirely omitted; or as if the word 'not,' was inserted immediately before them. The sense would then be that the privileges of the act would be conferred on 'all buildings, factories, works, and machinery, in process of erection before and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1873, until, etc.'"

In Mengel Box Co. v. Louisville (1904) 117 Ky. 735, 79 S. W. 255, where a box company had decided to close out its business and had ceased to make any new contracts, and was merely running for the purpose of completing unfinished contracts, when a corporation, a number of the members of which were members of the old concern, was organized and purchased the plant for the manufacture of boxes, the court, in deciding that the new corporation was entitled to a tax exemption like that contended for in Mengel Box Co. v. SEA, ante, 108, said: "If the transaction had only been the enlargement of an old plant,—the mere addition of capital to a going concern,—the conclusion of the chancellor would have been sound, but the evidence does not disclose this state of facts. The old plant was dead. It was not to be merely enlarged by the transaction, but the property was to go as a small part of the new plant." W. W. A.

Stockbridge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For the decision of this appeal it is scarcely necessary to do more than to understand clearly the facts out of which it arises in their proper relation to one another. On the 3d of April, 1913, a judgment was entered by confession in the Baltimore city court in favor of the appellees against George E. Frey and Jennie E. Frey, for the sum of $270. Being a judgment against joint defendants it was an entirety. Ewing v. Rider, 125 Md. 149, 93 Atl. 409.

At the time of the entry of this judgment George E. and Jennie E. Frey, his wife, owned as tenants by entireties, but subject to mortgage, a leasehold lot of ground on Linden avenue in the city of Baltimore. By the provisions of Code of Public General Laws, art. 26, § 19, the entry of a judgment makes it a lien upon leasehold estates as well as real property, except as to certain enumerated estates, of which a tenancy by the entireties is not one. An actual levy on real and leasehold property is not requisite to perfect the lien. The judgment being an entirety, and the estate of the Freys in the Linden avenue property being one by the entireties, the lien of the judgment attached to the property. What does and what does not constitute a lien depends upon the statutes of each state. Re Koslowski (D. C.) 153 Fed. 823.

The case as presented is entirely different from what it would have been if the judgment had been against either Mr. or L.R.A.1916D.

Mrs. Frey alone. This arises from the peculiar nature of an estate by entireties. It has been repeatedly held in this state that where a judgment is recovered against one of two tenants by the entireties no lien can attach to the interest of one (Jordan v. Reynolds, 105 Md. 288, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1026, 121 Am. St. Rep. 578, 66 Atl. 37, 12 Ann. Cas. 51, and cases there cited), but it has never been held in this state or elsewhere that in the absence of statutory exemption, where there is an entire judgment against joint defendants, no lien is imposed upon estates or interests in land held by the entireties.

On the 9th February, 1914, George E. Frey filed his voluntary petition to be adjudicated a bankrupt, and two days later the present appellees, the judgment creditors of Mr. and Mrs. Frey, appeared by petition in the bankruptcy proceedings and asked to be allowed to proceed upon their judgment. On February 21st, George E. Frey answered their petition, and in opposition to granting the prayer of the petition, set up the fact that he and his wife had filed a motion in the city court to have the judgments stricken out. The motion to strike out the judgment was in fact filed on the same day as the answer to the petition. Upon hearing, the motion was denied on the 13th March following, and thereafter, on May 5th, the order of the district court of the United States granting the appellees leave to proceed on their judgment was made absolute. A fieri facias was issued upon the judgment, on which a return of nulla bona was made. Nothing further transpired until November 7, 1914, when George E. Frey was discharged in bankruptcy.

No attempt appears to have been made by the bankrupt trustee to make claim to any interest in the Linden avenue property. He probably regarded it as valueless for the creditors under the doctrine announced in Re Beihl (D. C.) 197 Fed. 870, cited and adopted in Remington on Bankruptcy, § 970, p. 760, as follows: "In some jurisdictions the common-law rule that property held by husband and wife jointly is held in entirety, without possibility of severance, still prevails. Each has only an expectancy, for upon the death of one of the other takes the estate; and, although the husband's trustee in bankruptcy is undoubtedly clothed with the husband's interest, whatever that may be, his right to it must await the contingency of the husband surviving the wife."

About two months after the discharge, namely on January 26, 1915, Jennie E. Frey died, and by operation of law the entire estate in the Linden avenue property was then vested in George E. Frey, but it necessarily was subject to any valid outstanding liens against the property, whether such lien was in the form of a mortgage, or a judgment which by statute was made a lien upon real and leasehold estates. The judgment lien of the appellees was not void under the bankrupt act, § 67, having been entered more than four months prior to the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, nor was it void for any reason in its obtention. This was established by the Baltimore city court when it overruled the motion to strike out the judgment. The discharge of the bankrupt was only personal to the debtor. It was entirely without effect as to any liens subsisting at the time. Collier, Bankr. p. 362; Remington, Bankr. § 2668; Blick v. Nimmo, 121 Md. 142, 88 Atl. 116.

The writ of fi. fa. issued in May, 1914, having been returned nulla bona, the appellees, in April of this year, 1915, again directed the writ to issue, and under that a levy was made upon the Linden avenue property. The bill in this case was then filed by George E. Frey to restrain proceedings under the writ. A demurrer to the bill was interposed and sustained, and the bill was dismissed "without prejudice to the right of the complainant to proceed in the case pending against him in the Baltimore city court, being the execution, by way of feri facias, on a judgment in said court in the matter of George McGaw et al. v. George Frey and Jennie Frey."

It was earnestly argued in support of the demurrer that there was a complete, adequate remedy at law, and for that reason alone the demurrer should be sustained. This court is not called on to rule specifically on this point in the present case, and without so deciding it may well be that conditions might arise in which it would be appropriate for the equity court to take jurisdiction, even though there was a remedy at law of which a plaintiff might avail himself.

Among other grounds it is urged in behalf of the appellant that Jennie E. Frey left other property than that on Linden avenue against which the defendants in this suit might have proceeded, and that though administration has been granted upon her estate there has been no attempt to bring her representatives into these proceedings.

The answers to both of these contentions are obvious.

A plaintiff who has recovered a judgment is not required to look to any one piece of property rather than another for the purpose of enforcing it. He may proceed against such property of his debtor as he thinks most likely to produce sufficient to satisfy his claim, in the easiest and least expensive manner. The only limitation to which he is subject is that he is entitled to have but one satisfaction of his claim.

To the second objection the answer is that the Linden avenue property formed no part of the estate of Jennie E. Frey. Upon her death the interest to which she had been entitled devolved upon her husband by operation of law, subject to all valid outstanding liens. He acquired no right in it through the medium of administration upon her estate. So far as this property was concerned, therefore, her representatives were neither necessary nor proper parties to the proceeding.

From the foregoing considerations it follows that the circuit court, No. 2, of Baltimore city, was correct in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill. This court cannot agree with that portion of the decree which makes the dismissal of the bill "without prejudice to the right of the complainant to proceed in the Baltimore city court."

As already shown, the judgment was an entire one (Ewing v. Rider, 125 Md. 149, 93 Atl. 409); a motion to set it aside had been made on behalf of both defendants, and denied. Nothing appears to have been done in the city court subsequent to the issue of the writ of fi. fa. in April of this year, and nothing could have been done by a judgment debtor who died before the issuance of the writ. Nor is any valid reason given in the bill to justify a quashing of that writ. There was, however, no appeal taken by the appellees, and therefore the question of the propriety of so much of the decree as dismissed the bill "without prejudice to the right of the complainant to proceed in the Baltimore city court" is not before us for any action.

Decree affirmed; the appellant to pay the costs.

Annotation—Discharge of liability of one spouse on judgment against both as affecting lien on estate by entireties.

The question as to the effect of a judgment against individuals as lien on interest of tenant by entirety is covered in notes appended to Jordan v. Reynolds, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1026, and to Beihl v. Mar-L.R.A.1916D.

tin, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 555. And the question of the liability of an estate by entireties for the husband's debts is treated in a note in 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 206; and the validity of encumbrance by husband and wife of property held by the entireties to secure the individual debt of the husband, in a note in 66 L.R.A. 632:

No case has been found other than FREY v. MCGAW, ante, 113, which considers the specific question here raised. In this connection, however, a case of interest is Humberd v. Collings (1897) 20 Ind. App. 93, 50 N. E. 314, which holds that an assessment against an estate by entirety becomes invalid as to both parties where, by reason of irregularities, it is set aside as to the husband. The court reasoned that since the husband was released from the assessment, it was equivalent to releasing his lands which were subject to such assessment, and that while the wife had not been released, yet since he was in possession of the property and had the right of possession as tenant by entirety, the effect of the release was to relieve the land from the lien of the assessment as to both husband and wife. ### NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

MUNN & COMPANY, Resp.,

v.

THE AMERICANA COMPANY et al., Appts.

(83 N. J. Eq. 309, 91 Atl. 87.)

Unfair trade — grounds for relief.

1. The basis of suits to enjoin the use of the complainant's name is the damage or possibility of damage to the complainant, not the damage or probability of damage to the public; fraudulent conduct on the part of the defendant is a necessary element, but fraudulent conduct without damage to the complainant does not suffice.

For other cases, see Injunction, I. m, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — necessity of clean hands.

2. Since it is the complainant who is to be protected in suits to enjoin the use of his name, he must come into court with clean hands.

For other cases, see Equity, III. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — deception — right to relief.

3. Where the complainant and defendant agreed that an encyclopedia should be represented to the public as the work of the complainant, in order to avail themselves of its reputation to attract subscribers for the book, the complainant cannot be heard to complain of conduct in which it joined and by which it profited.

For other cases, see Equity, III. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — denial of relief — act of court.

4. Where complainant and defendant agreed that an encyclopedia should be represented to the public as the work of the complainant, in order to avail themselves of its reputation to attract subscribers for the book, and subsequently the complainant terminated the agreement and sought to enjoin the use of its name, the court denied relief because the complainant did not come into court with clean hands, although the point was not raised by the defendant in its answer.

For other cases, see Equity, III. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Equity — absence of clean hands — effect.

5. Where a complainant's conduct has been such that he does not come into court with clean hands, the disqualification applies only to the particular matter or transaction with which the wrongful conduct has to do, and he may have relief in other respects.

The defendants, having begun the use of the name "Scientific American Compiling Department" under agreement, are estopped from asserting the right to use it independently of agreement.

In any event, the misrepresentation and wrongful use of the name by the defendants would entitle the complainant to insist upon the discontinuance of the use of the name.

The complainant is not barred by estoppel or laches.

Neither the agreement of 1904 nor the conduct of complainant thereunder constituted a fraud upon the public.

Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The basis of suits of this character is the damage or possibility of damage to the complainant, not the damage or probability of damage to the public. The question sometimes discussed is whether relief may be rested on a personal basis alone, or whether damage to property rights is necessary,—a question left undecided in this court in Vanderbilt v. Mitchell, 72 N. J. Eq. 910, 926, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 304, 67 Atl. 97. In an early English case the court refused an injunction to restrain the sale of a quack medicine under the name of the complainant, an eminent physician. Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112, 17 L. J. Ch. N. S. 142, 12 Jur. 149. And although the case is not of great authority, the criticism upon it L.R.A.1916D.

was not due to the fact that the court refused at the suit of an individual to restrain a fraud upon the public, but to the fact that it overlooked the property right of a man in his own name. Maxwell v. Hogg, L. R. 2 Ch. 307, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 433, 16 L. T. N. S. 130, 15 Week. Rep. 467. The court of chancery has held that there is such a right. Edison v. Edison Polyform & Mfg. Co. 73 N. J. Eq. 136, 67 Atl. 392. Although damage is the basis of the suit, the mere fact of damage or possibility of damage is not enough, since damage may result from lawful acts, such as legitimate competition. Fraudulent conduct on the part of the defendant is a necessary element. International Silver Co. v. Rogers, 71 N. J. Eq. 560, 563, 63 Atl. 977. But fraudulent conduct without damage to the complainant does not suffice. The case upon which the complainant relied was expressly put upon the ground of the liability of the complainant to loss. Walter v. Ashton [1902] 2 Ch. 282, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 839, 87 L. T. N. S. 196, 18 Times L. R. 445, 51 Week. Rep. 131.

The very discussion suffices to show that, although fraudulent conduct which may deceive the public is a necessary element, it is the private loss of the complainant that is to be prevented, not the public injury arising to others from the fraudulent use of the complainant's name. This is in consonance with general principles. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the point. Its importance in the present case is due to its bearing upon the standing of the complainant to maintain its bill. If it were the public that is to be protected, the conduct of the complainant ought not to prevent relief. Since it is the complainant that is to be protected, the well-established maxim of equity is applicable; the complainant must come into court with clean hands.

The facts found by the learned vice chancellor establish an agreement on the part of the complainant and the Americana Company to make money out of the public by representing the encyclopedia as the work of the Scientific American, and thereby availing themselves of the reputation of that journal to attract subscribers for the book. The adoption of the name Scientific American Compiling Department cannot be otherwise explained. The word "department" in that expression can hardly convey to the ordinary mind any other meaning than Department of the Scientific American; and the language of the letter addressed by Munn & Company, to the American people, under date of May, 1906, is carefully chosen to convey the same impression without saying so in express words. The encyclopedia is therein said to be issued under the direct editorship and personal supervision of the editor of the Scientific American, although his actual connection with the work was slight; he is said to be assisted by a board of eminent department editors; the natural impression conveyed is that they were editors of departments of the Scientific American, since nothing else is mentioned that could have departments; in fact, so far as appears, no editor of the Scientific American except Mr. Beach was connected with the encyclopedia. The book is said to be a great work "published by the Scientific American Compiling Department," with the full co-operation of Munn & Company, who add that they are certain that it will be found standard in its information and fully equal to the reputation of the Scientific American for accuracy and reliability. The gravamen of the complainant's bill is that Munn & Company will be injured in their good business reputation by the fraud of the defendants in palming off the book upon the public as a work connected with the Scientific American. Yet that is the very scheme in which the parties joined for years prior to 1911. We think the complainant cannot now be heard to complain of conduct in which they formerly joined and by which they profited. It makes no difference whether the encyclopedia is valuable or not, nor whether purchasers thereof have been damaged; it is enough that they have been or may have been beguiled of their money because the complainant's representations, and the representations of the defendant to which the complainant assented, persuaded them that they were buying a work which was made better by the co-operation of the Scientific American. We think that the complainant, when it tires of its bargain and seeks to enjoin the defendant from further profiting by the supposed connection, does not come into court with clean hands. Fraudulent conduct which the law would enjoin but for the agreement of the parties to exploit the public is as inimical to public policy as gambling in cotton, which is condemned by statute, and the rule applied in Minzesheimer v. Doolittle, 60 N. J. Eq. 394, 45 Atl. 611, is applicable to the present case. The principle applied in the law courts in Hope v. Linden Park Blood Horse Asso. 58 N. J. L. 627, 55 Am. St. Rep. 614, 34 Atl. 1070, and Wyckoff v. Weaver, 66 N. J. L. 648, 52 Atl. 356, is in effect the same.

The failure of the defendants to question in their answer the standing of the complainants is not material. This very point was made and overruled by this court in Minzesheimer v. Doolittle, supra. As we there said, the court will not, for any delinquency of the defendant, lend its assistance to a violation of law; and so it will L.R.A.1916D.

not assist one who has joined in an effort to deceive the public to prevent his associate from continuing to do the very thing to which he has previously assented.

We think therefore that the decree must be reversed; but it does not follow that the complainant is not entitled to some of the relief granted. The disqualification applies only to the particular matter or transaction with which the wrongful conduct had to do. Woodward v. Woodward, 41 N. J. Eq. 224, 4 Atl. 424. In this case the complainant's wrongful conduct had to do with the exploiting of the encyclopedia under the name of Scientific American Compiling Department. The complainant is not shown to have assented to the use of the name Scientific American for any other purpose. So far as the decree enjoins the Scientific American Compiling Department from using its corporate name, it must be reversed; so far as it enjoins the use of the name Scientific American in other ways, it must be affirmed. The defendants are entitled to costs in this court.

White, J., dissenting (filed June 29, 1914):

I concur in the legal principles enunciated in the foregoing opinion, but dissent from a finding of fact by this court the existence of which, besides seeming to me quite doubtful, was not raised by the pleadings, nor tried as an issue, nor considered nor found as a fact by the vice chancellor who tried the cause. Under such circumstances, it may well be that the record discloses scant proof in denial of what no one has seen fit to assert. This court's finding of fact is that the publication of the Encyclopedia Americana under the published name of "Scientific American Compiling Department," and other representations to the effect that the work was edited and issued under the direct editorship and supervision of the editor and editorial organization of the Scientific American, were a fraud upon the public. This finding obviously depends upon whether or not these representations were in fact false or true, and that question was not put at issue, tried, nor decided in the court from the decree of which this appeal is taken. It is true the vice chancellor found that, as between the business organizations of the complainants and of the defendants below, the former had contributed toward the co-operative enterprise (1) the reduction of the regular yearly subscription price of the Scientific American magazine, and (2) the exclusive right during the period of the contract to the use of the name "Scientific American Compiling Department," and had received in return an assurance of at least 10,000 new subscriptions per year to the Scientific American magazine and the payment of the special price therefor; but these findings were in connection with the discussion of the question of an accounting and of the nature of the privilege for the use of the name. They did not pretend to relate to the question of a fraud upon the public, and that question was not considered. The evidence showed that in fact the editor in chief of the Scientific American, Mr. Beach, was made editor in chief of the new work, the encyclopedia, and that he helped select the authors of the treatises going into the work, and that the reference bureau and the plates of the Scientific American were largely, or at least to an extent, used in getting up and printing the encyclopedia.

From this it would seem, and doubtless if the question of a fraud upon the public had been raised or considered it would have otherwise appeared, that the complainants took ample means to see that the encyclopedia was of the high character which the representations that it was edited by the editor in chief of and issued in connection with the Scientific American gave the public the right to expect (in this connection it is significant that no subscriber has appeared to allege that the work was in fact otherwise than of this high character), and, if this was true, I think there was no fraud upon the public. The representations amounted to nothing except in so far as they were a guaranty of the care on the part of the Scientific American people that the work would accord in high character with what their reputation gave the public the right to expect from them. Purchasers of the work were not interested in the typesetters nor in the bookbinders or other mechanics whose labor went into the production of the encyclopedia, except in so far as the result of their labor was concerned; nor were they otherwise interested in the individuality of the authors who wrote the articles comprising the work, nor in how the profits from its sale were divided up. Everyone would, of course, know that the encyclopedia is not written by the editor in chief, nor by the assistant editors of the Scientific American, but that necessarily a large number of authorities would be employed to write about subjects upon which they were specialists. The artistic success of the encyclopedia would, of course, therefore depend, more than upon anything else, upon the judicious selection of these specialist authors. That selection is what stamped the character of the work, and that selection was one of the important things to which the editor in chief of the Scientific American gave his attention.

Apparently, therefore, the public got exactly what complainants undertook they should get, and I cannot see where there was any fraud upon the public either practised or attempted. Certainly, as I view it, the fraud is not so apparent that, in a case where it was not in issue and no one thought of either proving or disproving it, a court of appeal should lay hold of it on its own motion, not only to deprive complainants of what I think would otherwise be their clear right to protect their property right in their business name, but also to perpetuate, in the continued use of the name Scientific American in connection with future editions of the encyclopedia, what, now that the Scientific American editorship and co-operation has been withdrawn, will hereafter certainly be, as I think it was not before, a fraud upon the public.

Annotation—Protection of public as ground for injunction against misuse of trademark or tradename.

While, as hereinafter more specifically pointed out, the doctrine has been asserted that one of the grounds for interference by equity to protect a trademark or tradename against simulation on the ground of unfair competition is to prevent a fraud and deceit being perpetrated on the public by palming off upon consumers the goods or articles of one manufacturer for those of another in which the public has confidence, yet it may be doubted if, by such declarations, more is intended than merely to lay down as a ground for granting injunctive relief to the plaintiff where he is being injured in a property right, that the action of the defendant is misleading and deceiving the public to the injury of the latter, as well as to the injury of the plaintiff. These cases can hardly be relied upon as sustaining the view that, although the producer or manufacturer of an article has no legal right or ground for injunctive relief in his own behalf against the simulation of the tradename or trademark applied to the article he produces, nevertheless if it appears that the public will be deceived and misled by such simulation, relief will be given. MUNN & Co. v. AMERICANA Co. ante, 116, is direct authority that the right to relief must be based upon the equities and title of the plaintiff rather than upon any injury to the public, and this holding is in harmony with that of other cases where the question has specifically been presented.

Thus, in Weener v. Brayton (1890) 152 Mass. 101, 8 L.R.A. 640, 25 N. E. 46, where the plaintiff was held not entitled to relief on the ground that any right of his was being violated, the rule is declared that it is necessary "for those who claim that their right of property in a trademark has been invaded, to show that they are in some way by themselves, or with others, the owners thereof by reason of some business which they are transacting together, and to which its use is incident, and that it is not merely a personal privilege which they possess as members of a particular association of wide extent and embracing many persons of varied interest, to advertise, or have advertised by those by whom they are employed, the articles made by them as being made by members of such association." And the court points out that it will be found that where "an injunction has been granted or an action maintained, it has been at the instance of one who was himself a manufacturer, dealer in, or owner of the articles which were fraudulently represented by the counterfeited labels, wrappers, or advertisements to be his. In such case the fraud complained of would have a natural and inevitable tendency to lessen the sales, affect the reputation of the articles manufactured or dealt in, and injure the business of the complainant, and would thus afford him a ground for relief by reason of the special and peculiar damage which he would sustain or to which he might be exposed. The plaintiffs show by their bill that they have a right to use the label in question, and that it is a valuable privilege; but although they aver that they have suffered loss by the use of it by the defendant, they do not show that any business which they pursue has been affected, or that they can have sustained any definite loss or any injury except that which must be extremely remote and purely speculative."

And in American Washboard Co. v. Saginaw Mfg. Co. (1900) 50 L.R.A. 609, 43 C. C. A. 233, 103 Fed. 281, it is said that the "plaintiff comes into a court of equity in such cases for the protection of his property rights. The private action [relief] is given not for the benefit of the public, although that may be its incidental effect, but because of the invasion by defendant of that which is the exclusive property of complainant." L.R.A.1916D.

Much to the same effect is Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. (1863) 4 De G. J. & S. (Eng.) 137, affirmed (1865) 11 H. L. Cas. 523. In this case the plaintiff was denied relief in his own behalf on the ground of false representations in his trademark, and Lord Chancellor Westbury took occasion to say that "imposition on the public, occasioned by one man selling his goods as the goods of another, cannot be the ground of private action or suit. In the language of Lord Thurlow in Webster v. Webster (1791) 3 Swanst. (Eng.) 492, 19 Revised Rep. 258, 'the fraud upon the public is no ground for the plaintiff's coming into this court.'"

And in Levy v. Walker (1878) L. R. 10 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 436, it is declared that the ground of injunctive relief is "solely for the purpose of protecting the owner of a trade or business from a fraudulent invasion of that business," and not to protect the public from being misled.

As already suggested, a doctrine has occasionally been asserted indicating that the protection of the public from fraud and deception is a sufficient ground for granting relief to the manufacturer or producer of an article against the simulation of the article, or the mark or name applied to it or used in the business of the producer. Thus, in Matsell v. Flanagan (1867) 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 459, in enjoining the use of a tradename in which the plaintiff had no exclusive proprietary interest, the rule is asserted that the enforcement of the doctrine that trademarks shall not be simulated does not depend entirely upon the alleged invasion of individual rights, but as well upon the broad principle that the public are entitled to protection from the use of previously appropriated names or symbols in such manner as may deceive them by inducing or leading to the purchase of one thing for another. And this rule is approved in American Grocer Pub. Assn. v. Grocer Pub. Co. (1876) 51 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 402. And the case was also cited with approval in Imperial Mfg. Co. v. Schwartz (1903) 105 Ill. App. 525, wherein the court asserts the rule to be that "the public are entitled to protection from being misled to trade with parties not known to them, under the impression that they are doing business with an established firm or person with whom they have been accustomed to deal." But in this case the corporation invoking equity aid had a right to its corporate name, although not exclusive, except as it might receive protection on the ground of unfair competition. And this was also the situation in Matsell v. Flanagan (N. Y.) supra. And this was also true as to McFell Electric & Teleph. Co. v. McFell Electric Co. (1903) 110 Ill. App. 182, which follows Imperial Mfg. Co. v. Schwartz.

Supporting this doctrine, in Grocers Journal Co. v. Midland Pub. Co. (1907) 127 Mo. App. 356, 105 S. W. 310, the court points out that the doctrine of unfair competition is based on two grounds. First, that the man who has established a reputation for his goods by the excellence of his product, under a certain mark or symbol indicating its origin or manufacture, is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of the good will and the fruits and reputation of the business thus established. And second, the purchasing public are entitled to have precisely what they have purchased, and hence will be protected against the simulation of an article or its name for the purpose of palming off the counterfeit for the original.

Although not in point on its facts, attention is called to the case of Memphis Keeley Institute v. Leslie E. Keeley Co. 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 921, holding that equity will not aid the manufacturer of a secret medicine, the sale of which has been built up by fraudulent representations to the public as to its ingredients, by requiring the cancelation of a contract of an institution purporting to administer such remedies, upon the theory that failure to grant such relief would enable the defendant to impose upon the public by claiming the right to administer the remedies. The case of Seattle Electric Co. v. Snoqualmie Falls Power Co. 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1032, and note, as to equitable enforcement for a limited time, to prevent a public inconvenience, of a contract which is against public policy, are also referred to as of collateral interest in this connection. #### NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

GALLIARD EWDARDS, Admr., etc., of
v.

INTERSTATE CHEMICAL CORPORATION.

(— N. C. —, 87 S. E. 635.)

Death — recovery by person injured — action by representative.

A satisfied judgment for injuries inflicted by another's negligence, in favor of the person injured, bars an action under the statute by his personal representative for death resulting from the injury.

For other cases, see Death, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(Clark, Ch. J., dissents.)

(January 12, 1916.)

Note.—The question as to the effect of a judgment in an action for a personal injury as a bar to an action for the death of the person injured as a result of the injury is considered in a note appended to St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Goode, L.R.A.1915E, 1152, which is cited in EDWARDS v. INTERSTATE CHEMICAL CORP. In a note appended to Kelliber v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. L.R.A.1915E, 1178, the question is considered as to the right of action for injuries resulting in death when any action by the injured person to recover for his injuries was barred by the statute of limitations at the time of his death. And in the same L.R.A.1916D.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mecklenburg County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

Civil action to recover damages for death of intestate caused by alleged negligence of defendant company, heard on demurrer to answer. The facts relevant to the inquiry are sufficiently embodied in the judgment of his Honor overruling the demurrer in terms as follows: "This cause coming on to be heard before his Honor, James L. Webb, judge presiding at said September term, 1915, of the Mecklenburg superior court, and being heard upon the complaint filed by the plaintiff, the answer filed by the defendant, and the demurrer filed by the plaintiff to the further defense set up in defendant's answer; and it appearing to volume at page 1185, there is reported the North Carolina case of Causey v. Seaboard Ail Line R. Co., which holds that the bar by the lapse of time of one's right of action for personal injuries does not affect the right of his administrator to maintain the statutory action for such injuries where they resulted in death, the action being in behalf of the statutory beneficiaries.

Upon first impression it might appear that the decision of the North Carolina court in EDWARDS v. INTERSTATE CHEMICAL CORP., that the recovery by the injured person of a judgment for the injuries and satisfaction thereof are a bar to an action the court from the pleadings referred to that this action is brought by the plaintiff on account of the death of intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, and it appearing from the further defense set up in the defendant's answer that the plaintiff's intestate, Jesse Edwards, prior to his death, brought an action for damages on account of the same injuries involved in the present action which the plaintiff in this action alleges resulted in her intestate's death; that the said action of Jesse Edwards v. Interstate Chemical Corporation was duly tried, and judgment rendered therein for the plaintiff, and that said judgment has been duly satisfied by the defendant, all of which will more fully appear by reference to the further defense set out in the defendant's answer, the plaintiff having filed a demurrer to said further defense admitting the truth of the allegations contained therein,—now, therefore, it is hereby considered, ordered, and adjudged that the said demurrer filed by the plaintiff be overruled, and that the plaintiff's action be, and it hereby is, dismissed by order of the court."

Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Messrs. E. R. Preston and Duckworth & Smith, for appellant:

Plaintiff's right of action is not barred by the fact that her husband, during his lifetime, recovered a judgment against the defendant company for personal injuries and sufferings which later resulted in his death.

by his personal representative where the injury subsequently resulted in death, although the latter action is in behalf of the statutory beneficiaries, is inconsistent with the holding of that court in the Causey Case referred to. If, however, the distinction pointed out in the note to the Kelliher Case, between an action and a right of action, is kept in mind, the two decisions may be reconciled on the ground that the recovery of a judgment by the deceased in his lifetime for the injury and the satisfaction thereof destroyed the right of action which the deceased had. The operation of the statute of limitations did not, L.R.A.1916D.

however, destroy the decedent's cause of action, but it merely operated to bar the remedy; hence the cause of action existed at the time of his death, and the remedy for the enforcement thereof in behalf of the statutory beneficiaries would not necessarily be affected by the fact that the decedent's remedy was barred in his lifetime. As pointed out in the note to the Kelliher Case, however, the cases are not in harmony as to the effect on the right of action in behalf of the statutory beneficiaries, of the fact that the remedy of the deceased to recover for the injuries was barred by lapse of time when he died.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented in the record has been much considered by the courts, and it has been very generally held—a position in which we fully concur—that the statute conferring a right of action for wrongfully causing the death of another, usually to be prosecuted by the personal representative, does not, and was not intended to, confer such right when the intestate, the injured party, had been compensated for the injury during his life, and had received such compensation in full adjustment of his claim. The legislation on the subject in this country is, to a large extent, modeled upon an English statute, commonly known as Lord Campbell's act, Stat. 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93, our own law (Revisal, §§ 59, 60) being substantially a reproduction of the English statute; and the construction put upon the law in England was that the action would not lie if the injured party had, during his life, received satisfaction for the wrong, these courts being of opinion that it was the purpose and meaning of the statute to deprive the wrongdoer of the protection oftentimes afforded by reason of the common-law principle that actions of this character died with the person. Read v. Great Eastern R. Co. (1868) L. R. 3 Q. B. 555. In that action, it was shown that the injured party, deceased, had accepted a sum of money in full satisfaction for the wrong, and the plea in bar was held a good defense. Blackburn, Judge, delivering the principal opinion, said in part: "Before that statute [Lord Campbell's act] the person who received a personal injury and survived its consequences could bring an action and recover damages for the injury, L.R.A.1916D.

but if he died from its effects, then no action could be brought. To meet this state of the law, the [act of Stat.] 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93, was passed," etc.,—and Lush, Judge, concurring, said in part: "I am of the same opinion. The intention of the statute is not to make the wrongdoer pay damages twice for the same wrongful act, but to enable the representatives of the person injured to recover in a case where the maxim, 'Actio personalis moritur cum persona,' would have applied. It only points to a case where the party injured has not recovered compensation against the wrongdoer."

This construction of the law has been very generally adopted by the courts of this country, whether the statutory action is considered a new right or a continuation of the old, and there is very little to be added to the cogent reasoning which they have presented in support of the position. Littlewood v. New York, 89 N. Y. 24, 42 Am. Rep. 271; Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Cassin, 111 Ga. 575, 50 L.R.A. 694, 36 S. E. 881; Thompson v. Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. 97 Tex. 590, 80 S. W. 990, 1 Ann. Cas. 231; Price v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 33 S. C. 556, 26 Am. St. Rep. 700, 12 S. E. 413; Hecht v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 132 Ind. 507, 32 N. E. 302; Mooney v. Chicago, 239 Ill. 414, 88 N. E. 194. And cases in Supreme Court of the United States and text-books of approved excellence recognize and approve the principle. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59-70, 57 L. ed. 417-421, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176; Tiffany, Death by Wrongful Act, 2d ed. § 124; 3 Elliott, Railways, 2d ed. § 1376; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 870; 13 Cyc. p. 325. In the citation to Tiffany, the author says: "If the deceased in his lifetime has done anything that would operate as a bar to a recovery by him in damages for the personal injury, this will operate equally as a bar in an action by his personal representatives for his death. Thus, a release by the injured party of his right of action, or a recovery of damages by him for the injury, is a complete defense in the statutory action."

In Vreeland's Case, Associate Justice Lurton, delivering the opinion, said: "But as the foundation of the right of action is the original wrongful injury to the decedent, it has been generally held that the new action is a right dependent upon the existence of a right in the decedent immediately before his death to have maintained an action for his wrongful injury."

A very satisfactory statement of the principle and the reasoning upon which it is properly made to rest will be found in the New York case of Littlewood v. New York,

89 N. Y. 24, 42 Am. Rep. 271, where Rapallo, Judge, delivering the opinion, in part said: "The counsel for the plaintiff is sustained by the authorities in the proposition upon which he mainly bases his argument in this case, viz., that the right of action given by the act of 1847 to the personal representatives of one whose death has been caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another is a new right of action created by the statute, and is not a mere continuation in the representatives of the right of action which the deceased had in his lifetime. But it seems to me that this is not the point upon which the case turns, and that the true question is whether, in enacting the statute, the legislature had in view a case like the present, where the deceased in his lifetime brought his action, recovered his damages for the injury which subsequently resulted in his death, and received satisfaction for such damages, and whether it was intended to superadd to the liability of a wrongdoer who had paid the damages for an injury, a further liability in case the party afterward died from such injury, for the damages occasioned by his death, to his next of kin; or whether the intention of the statute was to provide for the case of an injured party who had a good cause of action, but died from his injuries without having recovered his damages, and in such a case to withdraw from the wrongdoer the immunity from civil liability afforded him by the common-law rule that personal actions die with the person, and to give the statutory action as a substitute for the action which the deceased could have maintained had he lived. There can be no doubt that the legislature had power to create the double liability contended for, nor would it necessarily involve any inconsistency. The damages of the party injured are different and distinguishable from those which his next of kin sustained by his death, and no double recovery of the same damages would result. But it is equally clear that the legislature might give to the representatives the statutory right of action only as a substitute for the damages which the deceased was prevented by his death from recovering, and the question now is, What was their intention in this respect? The language of the act plainly indicates, I think, that the framers had in view the common-law rule, 'Actio personalis,' etc., and that their main purpose was to deprive the wrongdoer of the immunity from civil liability afforded by that rule. The . . . gist of the 1st section is that the wrongdoer 'shall be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death of the person injured and though the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to a felony.' It does not provide that the wrongdoer shall be liable notwithstanding that he shall have satisfied the party injured, or notwithstanding that the latter has recovered judgment against him, or notwithstanding any other defense he might have had at the time of the death, but merely that the death of the party injured shall not free him from liability, showing that this is the point at which the statute is aimed. The condition upon which the statutory liability depends is declared to be 'that the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued), have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages,' etc. This language is accurate if the act was intended to apply to the case of a party who, having a good cause of action for a personal injury, was prevented by the death which resulted from such injury, from pursuing his legal remedies, or who omitted in his lifetime to do so. It precisely fits such a case, but it is singularly inappropriate to the case of one who has in his lifetime maintained the action and actually recovered his damages. The form of expression employed in the act shows that the legislature had in mind the case of a party entitled to maintain an action, but whose right of action was by the rule of the common law extinguished by his death, and not the case of one who had maintained his action and recovered his damages. This still more strongly appears by reference to the words of the act which describe the wrongdoer against whom a right of action is given. He is not described by any language which is applicable to a party against whom judgment has been obtained by the deceased for the injury, but as 'the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued.' And the enactment is that this person shall be liable notwithstanding the death. It seems to me very evident that the only defense of which the wrongdoer was intended to be deprived was that afforded him by the death of the party injured, and that it is, to say the least, assumed throughout the act that at the time of such death the defendant was liable. In the present case the defendant does not answer the description of 'the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued.' It would not have been liable if the injured party were living, for the former judgment would be a complete bar. The statute may well be construed as meaning that the party who at the time of the bringing of the action 'would have been liable if death had not ensued' shall be liable to an action notwithstanding the death," etc.

These views of the learned judge, arising chiefly from the language of the statute, derive strong support from the suggestion that, although the statute may be considered in some respects as creating a new right of action, it has its foundation in a single wrong, and it is not likely that the legislature would intend to subject the wrongdoer to additional liability when he has made compensation to the injured party in his lifetime in full adjustment of the wrong done him. And, further, to hold that, notwithstanding such adjustment, the offender might at some time in near or distant future be subjected to an additional claim for damages on the death of the party injured, would be to impose upon such a claim an undue and prejudicial restriction, and would oftentimes prevent the injured party in his lifetime from realizing in his sore need a satisfactory and present compensation. A wrongdoer would be little inclined and hardly justified in offering adequate adjustment with such a possibility hanging over him.

We were referred by counsel to the case of Causey v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 166 N. C. 5, L.R.A.1915E, 1185, 81 S. E. 917, as being in contravention of our present ruling, but we do not so interpret the decision. In that case the question presented was whether the statute of limitations commenced to run from the time of the injury or from the death of the injured party, and the court, in adopting the latter period, held that the statute in that respect must be considered as conferring a new right of action; and, the statute of limitations in cases of this character, dealing only with the remedy, the statute would only commence to run from the time when, by the terms of the statute, the right of action arose, to wit, the death. True, in support of this position, it was said that the words of this act, conferring the right in cases "where, if the injured party had lived, he could maintain an action for damages," were only descriptive of the class of actions to which the statute referred, and did not operate to constitute it a survival of the old action. While this is certainly true on the facts there presented and in so far as the statute of limitations is concerned, it was by no means held, nor was it intended to hold, that this was all the significance that the language should receive in the further interpretation of the statute, nor was it decided in that case, or intended to be, that the statutory action, having for its basis one and the same wrong, was to be regarded as so entirely separate and distinct that an additional recovery could be had, notwithstanding that all claim for damages therefor had been fully adjusted in the lifetime of the injured party. And in case of Bolick v. Southern R. Co. 138 N. C. 370, 50 S. E. 689, to which we were also referred, the only question decided in that case was that the statutory action did not accrue till the death of the injured party, and could not therefore be incorporated by amendment with an action which had been instituted by the deceased in his lifetime.

It will be noted in Bolick's Case, that no compensation for the wrong had been received by the deceased, and therefore a cause of action existed in him at the time of his death, thus bringing the case under the exact language of the statute, and while the statutory right could not be pursued in the original action, the present chief justice, delivering the opinion, said: "When death occurs pending an action for personal injuries, such cause is merged in the action for the death, and the only remedy is that given under § 1498 of the Code [now Revisal, § 59],"—thus recognizing that to come within the language of the statute there must have been a cause of action existent at the time of his death. See notes to recent case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Goode, L.R.A.1915E, at page 1152, and State use of Melitch v. United R. & Electric Co. L.R.A.1915E, at page 1163.

There is no error in the judgment, and the same must be affirmed.

Clark, Ch. J., dissenting:

As said in Bolick v. Southern R. Co. 138 N. C. 370, 50 S. E. 689, "A cause of action for death by wrongful act cannot accrue until the death," and it was held that therefore it could not be set up by amendment to an action which had been instituted by the deceased himself for injuries which subsequently resulted in his death. It will surely follow from this that they are, so to speak, independent causes of action, and that a recovery for or the compromise of a cause of action for personal injuries by the deceased could not possibly bar an action for his wrongful death, which could only accrue subsequent thereto by his death. Whatever may be the opinion of the individual members of this court, whether a cause of action should be maintainable for wrongful death, this is not a matter for the courts, but for legislation. Formerly such cause of action could not be maintained. The legislature has now provided that such cause of action can be asserted. In this case, there has been a death, and the complaint alleges that it was caused by the negligence of the defendant. No one can recover for such cause of action except the administrator or executor of the deceased. Killian v. Southern R. Co.

128 N. C. 261, 38 S. E. 873, where the history of this legislation is given. It is now asserted by the personal representative for the first time. It has not been paid, and it has not been compromised, and it did not exist until the death of his intestate, who could not, and indeed did not attempt to, settle for such wrongful death.

It is true that in this action there should not be allowed any recovery for the physical pain and injury suffered by the intestate, which is usually an element in the damages recoverable for wrongful death, as this element has already been paid for. But the damages sustained by the wrongful death were given by the statute, and accrued subsequent to the recovery of the judgment by the intestate for his physical injuries, and the statute does not contemplate that payment for injuries and physical sufferings to the plaintiff's intestate should bar the family of the decedent from recovering for their loss of the value of his services to them. This is a subsequent and greater damage, and accrues to a different party.

It is true that the legislature might amend the statute to so provide. But it is very doubtful, considering the object of the statute, which is principally to provide for the dependent family of the decedent, that the legislature would so enact. Certainly it is not so enacted, and there is nothing in the wording of the statute which intimates to the court that the general assembly so intended.

In Bolick v. Southern R. Co. 138 N. C. 373, 50 S. E. 689, it was held: "It is no defense to an action to recover for the wrongful killing of the intestate that he had in his lifetime recovered a judgment against the same defendant for personal injuries which resulted in his death."

The opinion added: "We think this was correctly held, for there the death was a cause of action accruing subsequent to the judgment."

In Whitehurst v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 160 N. C. 2, 75 S. E. 812, the court, citing Bolick v. Southern R. Co. supra, held that where the plaintiff's intestate began an action for personal injuries and died before its termination, his personal representative could bring an action for the wrongful death.

In Broadnax v. Broadnax, 160 N. C. 432, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 725, 76 S. E. 216, it was held, again citing Bolick v. Southern R. Co. supra, that the amount of damages recovered for a wrongful death is not liable to be applied in payment of debts and legacies, and that such cause of action did not exist until the statutes therein recited, beginning with chapter 39, Laws 1854-55, L.R.A.1916D.

and succeeding statutes, which are now Revised 1905, §§ 59, 60. It follows inevitably that, as the action can only be brought by the personal representative, the decedent could not recover or compromise for such cause of action if he had attempted to do so, which he did not in this case.

In Watts v. Vanderbilt, 167 N. C. 567, 83 S. E. 813, it was held, citing Bolick v. Southern R. Co., that actions for injuries to the person do not survive. It was these injuries that the intestate recovered for. It is certainly based upon authority and reason, and settled by the above decisions, that the cause of action for which the deceased recovered judgment is an entirely separate and distinct cause of action from that for wrongful death for which this action is brought. The cause of action for personal injuries would have abated at the death of the decedent. The cause of action for wrongful death did not accrue till the death, and is created by the statute and in favor of a different party. A recovery or a compromise for the former being an entirely separate and distinct matter, both in law and fact and in a different right, such judgment or compromise cannot bar a recovery by the plaintiff for this entirely separate and distinct action for wrongful death.

This case depends upon the construction of our own statute, but the conclusion reached in this dissent is sustained by many decisions upon similar statutes elsewhere. Sturges v. Sturges, 126 Ky. 80, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1014, 102 S. W. 884; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Dixon, 179 U. S. 131, 45 L. ed. 121, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67; Donahue v. Drexler, 82 Ky. 157, 56 Am. Rep. 886; Meyer v. Zoll, 119 Ky. 480, 84 S. W. 543.

In Donahue v. Drexler, 82 Ky. 157, 56 Am. Rep. 886, it was held that a settlement by the decedent in his lifetime for injuries occasioned by assault and battery was no bar to an action by his widow for damages on account of his death caused thereby; the latter action being maintainable under the laws of that state.

In 8 R. C. L. 732, it is said: "Authorities are not wanting which take the view that under the survival act and the death act, two separate and distinct causes of action are created which may coexist, but have no connection, and that these two actions may be prosecuted concurrently. Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 53 Ark. 117, 7 L.R.A. 283, 13 S. W. 801; Texarkana Gas & El. Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark. 215, 43 Am. St. Rep. 30, 27 S. E. 66; Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Cassin, 111 Ga. 575, 50 L.R.A. 694, 36 S. E. 881; . . . Stewart v. United Electric Light & P. Co. 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 384, and note (104 Md.

332, 118 Am. St. Rep. 410, 65 Atl. 49; Bowes v. Boston, 155 Mass. 344, 15 L.R.A. 365, 29 N. E. 633; . . . Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 137, 44 L.R.A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 255."

The two actions, though prosecuted (under those statutes) by the same personal representative, are not in the same right, and hence a recovery and satisfaction in one is not a bar to recovery in the other. Mahoning Valley R. Co. v. Van Alstine, 77 Ohio St. 395, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 893, 83 N. E. 601. These decisions proceed on the ground that a statute similar to Lord Campbell's act creates a new cause of action, while the survival statute merely saves to the personal representative of the deceased an action which he could have brought in his lifetime for injuries arising from negligence and default, and that it must necessarily follow that neither action is an alternative or substitute for the other, and consequently they both may be maintained. Stewart v. United Electric Light & P. Co. 104 Md. 332, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 384, 118 Am. St. Rep. 410, 65 Atl. 49; Causey v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 166 N. C. 5, L.R.A.1915E, 1185, 81 S. E. 917.

Any injustice to the defendant, it was held, could be prevented by the trial judge limiting the recovery in the survival action for personal injuries to the loss occasioned to the deceased prior to his death, and in the action for the wrongful death to the pecuniary loss sustained by the beneficiaries under such act. Stewart v. United Electric Light & P. Co. supra; Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 137, 44 L.R.A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 255. In Burk v. Arcata & M. River R. Co. 125 Cal. 367, 73 Am. St. Rep. 52, 57 Pac. 1065, it is said: "Under our statute the injured person might survive long enough to sue and recover damages or to settle with the wrongdoer, and then by his death a new cause of action would accrue to his heirs."

In Brown v. Chattanooga Electric R. Co. 70 Am. St. Rep. 684, note, it was held: If "a statute makes the killing of a passenger of a railroad corporation through gross negligence punishable by a penalty payable to the widow and children or next of kin, such passenger cannot release the corporation from liability, and therefore his agreement to do so cannot bar an action brought for his death by an administrator for the benefit of the persons entitled to the penalty."

In the same case it is said: "It is an action for damages arising from the mere fact of death, not damages to the deceased, but damages to his successors under the statute. Therefore we cannot comprehend the reasoning which enables an injured person to release a cause of action which has not accrued, and cannot accrue until his death, and which then accrues to third persons. It would be necessary to support such a conclusion that we admit that a person has a right of action for his own death. A greater degree of absurdity would not be attained in the enactment of a statute making suicide punishable as murder in the first degree."

Upon the authorities, and it would seem upon the logic and the letter of the statute, the plaintiff's right of action in this case is an entirely separate and distinct cause of action from that for which his intestate recovered, and is not barred by the judgment recovered by such intestate for the personal injuries sustained which later resulted in his death and the creation thereby of the cause of action in favor of his personal representative for the benefit of those entitled to share in the distribution of his personal property. Revisal 1905, § 59. This recovery, it is expressly stated, shall be "such damages as are a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary injury resulting from such death." Revisal 1905, § 60. These could not possibly have accrued to the intestate or have been estimated in his favor.

Citizenship — marriage of woman to foreigner.

1. Under the Federal statute declaring

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Application in this court for a writ commanding defendants, as members of the board of election commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, to register the plaintiff as a qualified voter of said city and county.

The plaintiff was born and ever since has resided in the state of California. On August 14, 1909, being then a resident and citizen of this state and of the United States, she was lawfully married to Gordon Mackenzie, a native and subject of the Kingdom of Great Britain. He had resided in California prior to that time, still resides there, and it is his intention to make this state his permanent residence. He has not become naturalized as a citizen of the United States, and it does not appear that he intends to do so. Ever since their marriage the plaintiff and her husband have lived together as husband and wife. On January 22, 1913, she applied to the defendants to be registered as a voter. She was then over the age of twenty-one years, and had resided in San Francisco for more than ninety days. Registration was refused to her on the ground that by reason of her marriage to Gordon Mackenzie, a subject of Great Britain, she thereupon took the nationality of her husband, and ceased to be a citizen of the United States. The soundness of this objection is the question to be decided.

The qualifications necessary to entitle a person to the privilege of suffrage and the right of registration as a voter in this state are fixed, declared, and controlled by § 1 of article 2 of the state Constitution, as amended on October 10, 1911. The purpose of the amendment was to extend the privilege of suffrage to women. The portion of the section upon which the decision of this case depends is the opening clause, giving the privilege of suffrage to "every native citizen of the United States" who possesses the other qualifications mentioned in the subsequent parts of the section. It declares that persons having the qualifications stated shall "be entitled to vote at all elections." As it is admitted that the plaintiff possesses all the other qualifications required, the sole question presented is whether or not, upon the facts we have stated, she is a "native citizen of the United States." If she comes within that definition, she is entitled to registration as demanded. She was a citizen of the United States prior to her marriage to Mackenzie. No event affecting her status as a citizen, except said marriage, has occurred since that time. She therefore still remains a citizen of the United States, unless she has lost her citizenship by her marriage with an unnaturalized resident alien. Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 484, 25 L. ed. 628.

The status of persons as citizens or aliens, respectively, is controlled entirely by the Constitution of the United States and the acts of Congress passed in pursuance thereof. We must look solely to them to ascertain whether or not the plaintiff is a citizen and, as such, a voter entitled to registration.

And in determining their meaning and effect the state courts are bound by the interpretation put upon them by the courts of the United States.

Prior to any legislation on the subject by Congress, there was some uncertainty and conflict of authority concerning the right of expatriation. The question first arose in 1795, in Talbot v. Janson, 3 Dall. 133, 162, 1 L. ed. 540, 552, where Iredell, J., discusses it at length, stating his conclusion to be that a citizen could not denationalize himself without the consent of his government. The other justices expressed no opinion on the point. Similar views were stated in Shanks v. Dupont (1830) 3 Pet. 246, 7 L. ed. 668, Ingilis v. Sailor's Snug Harbour (1830) 3 Pet. 101, 125, 7 L. ed. 618, 626, and in United States v. Gillies (1815) Pet. C. C. 161, Fed. Cas. No. 15,206. In Shanks v. Dupont, the court said, per Story, J.: "The general doctrine is that no person can, by any act of their own, without the consent of the government, put off their allegiance and become aliens." And on this ground it was held that the marriage of a woman citizen with an alien did not change her allegiance to the United States. There was at that time no legislation permitting expatriation. In Stoughton v. Taylor, 2 Paine, 661, Fed. Cas. No. 7,558, it is said that the right of expatriation is fundamental and inherent. To the same effect, see Alsberry v. Hawkins, 9 Dana, 178, 33 Am. Dec. 546. Other state courts were of the same opinion. The denial of the right of voluntary expatriation was somewhat inconsistent with the laws of the United States providing for the naturalization of foreigners, the first of which was enacted in 1779. Act March 26, 1790, chap. 3, 1 Stat. at L. 103. The question was practically set at rest by the act of July 27, 1868. 15 Stat. at L. 223, chap. 249, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1999, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3955, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. p. 788. The preamble thereof declares that the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people. The body of the act declares further that any decision of any officer of the government denying, restricting, or impairing the right of expatriation is "inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this government." This language seems to be but little more than a legislative declaration of national policy. But it clearly is operative in this, that it gives the consent of the national government to the expatriation of any citizen by his or her voluntary act. If such consent of the nation is essential to a valid expatriation, this law is evidence thereof. The absolute right of expatriation is now recognized as the settled doctrine of this country. Browne v. Dexter, 66 Cal. 40, 4 Pac. 913; Kane v. McCarthy, 63 N. C. 302; Burton v. Burton, 1 Keyes, 359, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 271; Kelly v. Owen, 7 Wall. 496, 19 L. ed. 283; Re Look Tin Sing (C. C.) 10 Sawy. 353, 21 Fed. 905. In the case last cited the court says: "The United States recognize the right of everyone to expatriate himself and choose another country." In view of the contention to be hereafter mentioned, it is to be noticed that this case was decided after the adoption of the 14th Amendment.

The first legislation by Congress in regard to the status of married women as citizens was the act of 1855. Act Feb. 10, 1855, chap. 71, 10 Stat. at L. 604, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1994, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3948, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. p. 786. Section 2 is as follows: "That any woman who might lawfully be naturalized under the existing laws, married, or who shall be married, to a citizen of the United States, shall be deemed and taken to be a citizen." In the Revised Statutes the words "and taken" are omitted. The effect of this statute is that every alien woman who marries a citizen of the United States becomes perforce a citizen herself, without the formality of naturalization, and regardless of her wish in that respect. Kane v. McCarthy, 63 N. C. 302; Kelly v. Owen, 7 Wall. 496, 19 L. ed. 283. It is not entirely certain that, under our state Constitution, such citizenship would entitle such foreign-born woman to vote. Our Constitution confers that privilege only on three classes of persons: First, native citizens; second, those who became citizens under the treaty of Queretaro, or, as it is commonly called, the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; and, third, naturalized citizens. An alien woman who marries a citizen thereby herself becomes a citizen; but there may be doubt if she thereby becomes a naturalized citizen within the meaning of the Constitution. This is, of course, a question not here involved. We mention it only to call attention to the distinction, and to make it clear that we have not decided it.

The act of 1855 determines the citizenship of an alien woman who marries a citizen. We have in this case the converse of the proposition; the effect of the marriage of a native female citizen to a man who is not a citizen, but is a subject of some other country. In Pequignot v. Detroit (1883; C. C.) 16 Fed. 211, Judge Brown, afterward justice of the United States Supreme Court, decided that an alien woman who had become a citizen under the aforesaid act of 1855 by marrying a citizen, and who was divorced from that husband and thereafter married an unnaturalized alien, lost her citizenship by the last marriage and again became an alien, although both she and her last husband continued to reside in this country with the intention of remaining. In Ruckgaber v. Moore (C. C.) 104 Fed. 947, decided in 1900, the court held that a native woman who marries a French citizen and thereafter resides with him in France thereby loses her American citizenship and becomes a citizen of France, adding, however, that to accomplish this result she must, by residence abroad, or other equivalent act, express her intention to renounce her former citizenship by her marriage. Similar views were expressed in Trimble v. Harrison, 1 B. Mon. 147. In Comitis v. Parkerson (C. C.) 22 L.R.A. 148, 56 Fed. 556, decided in 1893, the court held that a native-born woman who had married an alien subject of Italy, permanently residing in the United States and intending to continue therein, did not thereby lose her citizenship, but remained a citizen of this country. The court said that the power to declare how the right of expatriation should be exercised, as well as that of naturalization, was exclusively in Congress; that expatriation could not take place without the consent of the United States, and that "Congress has made no law authorizing any implied renunciation of citizenship." It was mainly on this ground that the court rested its conclusion, although it was also said that, in the absence of any law of Congress as to the method of expatriation, it could not be said to take place, unless it was manifested by a removal from this country and a residence elsewhere. See also Beck v. McGillis, 9 Barb. 49; Shanks v. Dupont (1830) 3 Pet. 246, 7 L. ed. 668; Jennes v. Landes (C. C.) 84 Fed. 74; Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer, 125 Ill. 197, 198, 8 Am. St. Rep. 349, 17 N. E. 232.

When an alien and a citizen intermarry, they not infrequently return to reside, either temporarily or permanently, to the country of the alien spouse, thereby giving rise to questions concerning their rights as citizens or aliens of the respective countries, from which there have ensued international disputes to be discussed and settled by diplomatic correspondence between the United States and the foreign country. The fact that the courts of this country have held variant opinions on some phases of the subject has caused some perplexity in the state department, and like diversity of opinions has appeared from time to time in the correspondence of that department. All the courts have agreed, however, that the entire subject of naturalization and expatriation, including the method by which each might or could be accomplished and manifested, is a matter within the exclusive control of Congress. Under these conditions, the United States Senate, on April 13, 1906, passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a commission to "examine into the subjects of citizenship of the United States, expatriation, and protection abroad," and make a report with proposals for legislation thereon. In June, 1906, the house committee on foreign affairs, to which this resolution had been referred, requested the secretary of state to select three men connected with the state department, familiar with the subject, to investigate and make the desired report and recommendations. In pursuance of this request, Hon. Elihu Root, then secretary of state, directed Mr. James B. Scott, solicitor for the department of state, Mr. David Jaynes Hill, then minister to the Netherlands, and Mr. Gaillard Hunt, chief of the passport bureau, to make an inquiry, report, and proposals for legislation, as requested. These gentlemen proceeded, and on December 18, 1906, they made an elaborate and exhaustive report of 538 pages, with recommendations for legislation covering all the phases of the subject except that of naturalization, which was already provided for. With this document before it, Congress framed an act which became a law of March 2, 1907. 34 Stat. at L. 1228, chap. 2534, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3960, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1909, p. 69. This act now controls the subject referred to, including that involved in this case. Section 3 thereof is practically decisive of the case before us, and it is as follows: "That any American woman who marries a foreigner shall take the nationality of her husband. At the termination of the marital relation she may resume her American citizenship, if abroad, by registering as an American citizen within one year with a consul of the United States, or by returning to reside in the United States, or, if residing in the United States at the termination of the marital relation, by continuing to reside therein."

There is no escape from the conclusion that, under the provisions of this section, the plaintiff in this case, when she married Gordon Mackenzie, a British subject, thereupon took the nationality of her husband and ceased to be a citizen of the United States. Just as an alien woman who marries a citizen becomes a citizen herself, whether she wishes it or not, as the cases we have cited declare, so a female citizen who marries an alien becomes herself an alien, whether she intends that result as the consequence of her marriage or not. She must bow to the will of the nation, as expressed by the act of Congress. Owing to the possibility of international complications, the rule has generally prevailed, from considerations of policy, that the wife should not have a citizenship nor an allegiance different from that of her husband. The section aforesaid was intended to put this general doctrine into statutory form. When, after Congress by this act had declared that her marriage to an alien would accomplish her expatriation, and she thereafter married an alien, she is conclusively presumed to have intended thereby to renounce her citizenship of the United States and become a subject of Great Britain.

It is suggested that the object of the act, as expressed in its title, was to legislate solely for the protection of citizens abroad, and therefore that it should not be construed to apply to women who marry here and continue to reside in this country, or who marry an alien permanently residing in this country. As has been stated in reciting the origin of the act, such persons frequently remove to the country of which the husband is a subject, or to other foreign countries. It was the obvious purpose to provide a rule which should govern in cases of that kind. Furthermore, the language of the section shows that it contemplates that an American woman included within its terms will in some cases reside in the United States after contracting the marriage with the alien, and that it intends that she shall continue to have the nationality of her husband during such residence here, so long as the marriage relation continues. The interpretation contended for would be contrary to this provision, and therefore it is not permissible.

Plaintiff's counsel also contends that the act of Congress is contrary to the opening sentence of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, declaring that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." In support of this position they cite Re Look Tin Sing (C. C.) 10 Sawy. 353, 21 Fed. 905, and United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. ed. 890, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456. In the first-mentioned case, which was decided in 1884, Justice Field, of the United States Supreme Court, writing the decision for the circuit court of the United States for the district of California, held that a person born in the United States of Chinese parents residing therein at the time of his birth, and not members of the diplomatic force of China, was a native citizen of the United States, and was not subject to the act of Congress forbidding the re-entry into this country of Chinese who had returned temporarily to China, except where they had obtained a certificate allowing such return. This decision declares that a native-born person of any race is a citizen, under the aforesaid provision of the 14th Amendment, and it follows the familiar rule that such person remains a citizen so long as he chooses, provided he does no act which, under our laws, will have the effect of renouncing or forfeiting such citizenship. The Chinese exclusion act, it was held, did not affect the right of citizenship. But the quotation we have already given from this case shows that the court did not intend to hold, and did not hold, that the 14th Amendment forbids expatriation, or takes from Congress the power to legislate concerning it. In United States v. Wong Kim Ark, the same question was involved, and the same conclusion was reached. In the course of its very elaborate discussion of the proposition that the 14th Amendment affirms the "ancient and fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the territory" (169 U. S. page 693) the court said (169 U. S. page 703): "The power of naturalization, vested in Congress by the Constitution, is a power to confer citizenship, not a power to take it away." From this remark it is argued that a native-born citizen, cannot, since the adoption of that Amendment, renounce his citizenship. But this by no means follows. The court in the quoted sentence was speaking of the power of Congress to deprive a person of his citizenship without his consent and for no sufficient or reasonable cause. In the next paragraph of the opinion the court says (page 704): "Upon the facts agreed in this case, the American citizenship which Wong Kim Ark acquired by birth within the United States has not been lost or taken away by anything happening since his birth. No doubt he might himself, after coming of age, renounce his citizenship, and become a citizen of the country of his parents or of any other country." Thus, the opinion relied on itself recognizes and declares that citizenship may be renounced, notwithstanding the provisions of the 14th Amendment. As we have held that the act of the plaintiff here in marrying an alien was in effect a renunciation of her citizenship, it follows that she is not prevented from committing this act of expatriation by the aforesaid provision of the 14th Amendment.

We think it advisable to state here that the question of the effect of the marriage of a native female citizen to an alien, where such marriage had taken place before the passage of the act of 1907 aforesaid, is a question not involved in this case. It is not, therefore, to be deemed as a decision upon the question whether the section of the act of Congress above quoted was applicable to and operated upon citizens of the United States who were at that time married to alien husbands. From what we have said the conclusion is clear that the plaintiff here is not now a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the act of Congress above quoted, and, as that act controls the question of her citizenship, and her right to vote is made by our Constitution, as amended in 1911, dependent upon her status as a citizen of the United States, and does not exist unless she is such citizen, she is not entitled to the exercise of the privilege of suffrage, and cannot demand registration as a voter.

It is ordered that the writ applied for be denied.

Annotation—Effect of marriage on woman's status as an alien.

Earlier cases covering the question under annotation will be found in the note to Comitis v. Parkerson, 22 L.R.A. 149.

Alien marrying citizen.

As pointed out in the earlier note, the United States, in 1855, adopted a law § 1994, U. S. Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. (1913, § 3948) which provided that "any woman who is now or may hereafter be married to a citizen of the United States, and who might herself be lawfully naturalized, shall be deemed a citizen." And so by virtue of this section it has been held that an alien woman who marries a citizen of the United States, whether naturalized or native born, becomes herself a citizen. Ware v. Wisner (1883) L.R.A.1916D.

50 Fed. 310; Hopkins v. Fachant (1904) 65 C. C. A. 1, 130 Fed. 839; Sprung v. Morton (1910) 182 Fed. 330; Re Nicola (1911) 106 C. C. A. 464, 184 Fed. 322, affirming United States ex rel. Nicola v. Williams, 173 Fed. 626; Ex parte Grayson (1914) 215 Fed. 449; Belcher v. Farren (1891) 89 Cal. 73, 26 Pac. 791; Dorsey v. Brigham (1898) 177 Ill. 250, 42 L.R.A. 809, 69 Am. St. Rep. 228, 52 N. E. 303; Gumm v. Hubbard (1888) 97 Mo. 311, 10 Am. St. Rep. 312, 11 S. W. 61; Potter v. Hall (1901) 11 Okla. 173, 65 Pac. 841.

And in Broadis v. Broadis (1898) 86 Fed. 951, it was held that since the passage of the act of July 14, 1870, which extended the naturalization laws to aliens of African nativity or descent, § 1994 applies to an alien woman of African descent who married a negro citizen of the United States, so that a Federal court would not have jurisdiction of an action brought against her by a citizen of the state in which she resided.

And so, although, subsequently to the marriage and before reaching the United States, such a one contracts a contagious disease which would have warranted her exclusion were she an alien, she cannot be excluded as an alien. Re Nicola (Fed.) supra.

And an alien woman who, pending proceedings for her deportation, marries a citizen of the United States, becomes herself a citizen and is entitled to her discharge. Hopkins v. Fachant (1904) 65 C. C. A. 1, 130 Fed. 839.

And a foreign-born woman who is entitled to citizenship under this section may acquire land under the homestead laws. Potter v. Hall (1901) 11 Okla. 173, 65 Pac. 841.

And in Ware v. Wisner (1883) 50 Fed. 310, it was held that under § 1994 non-resident alien women who married United States citizens who were residents abroad became United States citizens so as to be entitled to take by inheritance under the laws of Iowa.

So, also, foreign-born women married to American citizens have the right to vote at school elections, under Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 1896, chap. 46, p. 1741, ¶ 342, if they have the specified qualifications as to age and residence. Dorsey v. Brigham (1898) 177 Ill. 250, 42 L.R.A. 809, 69 Am. St. Rep. 228, 52 N. E. 303.

But the marriage of an alien woman with a citizen after she has voted at a school election would not have any retroactive effect to make her vote valid. (Ill.) Ibid.

So, an alien woman who, pending proceedings to deport her as a prostitute, marries an American citizen, becomes a citizen, and an order of deportation cannot issue until her citizenship is revoked and she is relegated to the status of an alien. Ex parte Grayson (1914) 215 Fed. 449, appeal dismissed in (1915) 134 C. C. A. 666, 219 Fed. 1022. The court stated that in this case the woman did not belong to an excluded race, but was claimed to be excluded because of immoral character, and pointed out that it has been held that the clause in § 1994, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3948, "might herself be lawfully naturalized," applies to the race or class or nationality of persons who are excluded from citizenship, and L.R.A. 1915D.

not to the personal qualification of the individual whose class or race is not excluded, and does not apply to the character of the individual, and so distinguished Low Wah Suey v. Backus, infra.

But in Ex parte Kaprielian (1910) 188 Fed. 694, it was held that an alien woman who, after a deportation order had issued because she was afflicted with contagious disease, marries an American citizen, is not relieved from the order of deportation on the ground that she has become an American citizen. The court stated that it was no part of the intended policy of § 1994 to annul or override the immigration laws so as to authorize the admission into the country of the wife of a naturalized alien not otherwise entitled to enter, and an alien woman who is of a class of persons excluded by law from admission to the United States does not come within the provision of that section. The court distinguished Hopkins v. Fachant (Fed.) supra, stating that in that case the deportation order was held to have been arbitrarily and unlawfully issued, and the woman was married pending the decision on that question. Ex parte Kaprielian, it will be seen, is in conflict with the view taken in Ex parte Grayson (1914) 215 Fed. 449, as to the effect of § 1994. It would seem, however, that Ex parte Grayson has reason and authority on its side, and that the only way deportation can be affected in such a case would be by relegating the woman to her former status as an alien by the revocation of her citizenship.

In Hatch v. Ferguson (1893) 57 Fed. 959, it was held that an Indian woman, by reason of her having married a citizen of the United States, and also having voluntarily taken her residence apart from the tribe to which she belonged, and having adopted the habits of civilized life, became a citizen of the United States, and so was entitled to prosecute an action in the Federal court against citizens of a state other than that of which she was resident.

The following cases involving the rights of alien Chinese women who marry Chinamen born in the United States have been included, although not strictly within the scope of this annotation, the decisions turning not on their status as citizens, they belonging to the excluded race, but on their right to remain as the lawful wives of American citizens:

In Tsoi Sim v. United States (1902) 54 C. C. A. 154, 116 Fed. 920, a foreign-born Chinese woman who had been lawfully in this country up to the time of the passage of the Federal statutes requiring Chinese laborers in this country to procure a certificate of registration failed to register under the statute and so was liable to deportation, but before her arrest she was married to a Chinaman, born in, and a citizen of, the United States. In remanding the cause and ordering her discharge from custody on the ground that, although, under a strict construction of the statute, she could be deported, yet she would nevertheless have the unquestioned right to return and to be admitted into and remain in this country as the lawful wife of an American citizen, the court said that it was manifest that Congress never intended by the passage of the law to have it apply to a case like the present; that "appellant did not come to this country fraudulently or in violation of any law. She did not get married in order to evade deportation. Her marriage was not fraudulent, but lawful and in accordance with the usages and customs of our law. Whatever effect her error of omission in failing, during a few years of her infancy, to obtain a certificate of registration, if any she was entitled to, it certainly did not deprive her of the right to marry an American citizen lawfully domiciled in this country. This she did. By this act her status was changed from that of a Chinese laborer to that of a wife of a native-born American. Her husband is not before the court, but his rights as well as hers are involved. The law is well settled that one born in the United States of Chinese parents who were permanently domiciled here, though an alien, is a citizen of the United States and cannot be excluded therefrom or denied the right of entry. . . . The wife has the right to live with her husband, enjoy his society, receive his support and maintenance and all the comforts and privileges of the marriage relations. These are her, as well as his, natural rights. By virtue of her marriage her husband's domicile became her domicile, and thereafter she was entitled to live with her husband and remain in this country."

But a foreign born Chinese woman, though married to a Chinaman of American birth, was held in Low Wah Suey v. Backus (1912) 225 U. S. 460, 56 L. ed. 1165, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 734, to be an alien within the meaning of the provisions of the act of February 20, 1907, as amended by act of March 26, 1910, for the deportation of any alien found as an inmate of a house of prostitution within L.R.A.1916D.

three years subsequently to her entry into the United States. The court stated that she was a Chinese person not born in this country, and could not become a naturalized citizen under the laws of the United States, not being of that class who could be lawfully naturalized, and so, being incapable of naturalization herself although the wife of a Chinaman of American birth, she remained an alien and subject to the terms of the act. The court added: "The object of the act was to exclude alien prostitutes, or if they entered and were found violating the statute within the period prescribed, to return them to the country whence they came. A married woman may be as objectionable as a single one in the respects denounced in the law. There is nothing in the terms of the act showing the congressional purpose to exclude from its provisions an alien who had previously married or who might marry an American citizen. Indeed, if this construction were adopted the marriage of such alien to a countryman of American citizenship who might be ignorant of the conduct of the alien, or willing to condone it, would afford an easy means of evading the statute. In the present case, in view of the finding of the immigration officer, approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, it must be taken as true that, . . . notwithstanding her marriage relation, [she] was found in a house of prostitution in violation of the statute. This situation was one of her own making; and conceding her right to come into the United States and dwell with her husband because of his American citizenship, it is obvious that such right could have been retained by proper conduct on her part, and was only lost upon her violation of the statute; she, being an alien, thereby forfeiting her right to longer remain in this country."

Citizen marrying an alien.

Prior to the act of March 2, 1907 (see infra), there was some conflict of opinion as to whether a native-born American woman by marrying an alien became herself an alien, although latterly the courts were inclined to the view that if she continued to reside in the United States with no intention of giving up that residence, she retained her citizenship, but otherwise if she went abroad and took up her residence there. See cases in earlier note.

So, since the earlier note, it was held in Wallenburg v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1908) 159 Fed. 217, a case involving jurisdiction of the Federal court on the ground of diversity of citizenship, that a woman, a citizen of the United States, did not lose that citizenship by marrying an alien, at least so long as she continued to reside in the United States. No reference is made to the act of 1907.

But in Ruckgaber v. Moore (1900) 104 Fed. 947, 31 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 310, affirmed without opinion in 52 C. C. A. 587, 114 Fed. 1020, it was held that by virtue of § 1999 of the Rev. Stat. Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3955, which proclaims that expatriation is an inherent right, and of the statutes of France making an alien woman who marries one of their subjects herself a subject, a native-born American woman who married a citizen of France and went there to reside permanently must be regarded as a non-resident alien.

In Roa v. Collector of Customs (1912) 23 Philippine, 315, where the facts arose prior to the act of March 2, 1907, it was held that a Filipina who had married a Chinaman took his nationality during her coverture, but that after his death she reverted ipso facto to her former status. Judge Trent, in a note appended to his decision in this case, stated: "The inquiry in this case was the status of the law upon the questions therein involved in the absence of statutory enactment. The act of Congress of March 2, 1907, being in part declaratory of what the law was in the United States, confirms the principles announced in the foregoing decision as applicable to cases arising in this country."

In Jenns v. Landes (1898) 85 Fed. 801, under a Canadian statute which provides that "a married woman shall, within Canada, be deemed to be a subject of the state of which her husband is for the time being a subject," an American woman who married a subject of Great Britain domiciled in Canada was held to be an alien and so could sue in the Federal courts. The court stated that the only serious question arising was as to the construction and effect of the Canadian statute of 1886, and said: "The words of the act appear to be qualified and limited, and it is contended that it does not confer naturalization upon women married to Canadians except temporarily while they remain within Canada. Conceding this point, still the complainant is now, and at the time of commencing this suit was, naturalized in Canada and permanently domiciled there. If, by removing from Canada, her status as to her citizenship should be changed, still the jurisdiction of this court would L.R.A.1916D.

not be divested. Where the jurisdiction of a United States circuit court depends upon the citizenship or alienage of the parties, the jurisdictional fact must exist at the time when the jurisdiction is first invoked, and after the jurisdiction has attached it does not become divested by subsequent changes of residence or alteration of the status of the parties as citizens or aliens."

In order to do away with the confusion which resulted from the lack of harmony among the decisions, it was enacted that "any American woman who marries a foreigner shall take the nationality of her husband. At the termination of the marital relation she may resume her American citizenship, if abroad, by registering as an American citizen within one year with a consul of the United States, or by returning to reside in the United States, or if residing in the United States at the termination of the marital relation by continuing to reside therein." 34 U. S. Stat. at L. 1228, chap. 2534, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3960.

MACKENZIE v. HARE, ante, 127, held that the statute controls the status of a native-born woman who marries an alien, and that by such marriage she loses her citizenship, and in this case the right of suffrage conferred on her by the Constitution of California, and this although married to an alien who has a permanent residence in this country. This decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in (1915) 239 U. S. 299, 60 L. ed. —, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106. That court not only rejected the contention of counsel that the act, in view of its history and purpose, should be confined in its application to the status of citizens "abroad," but also the contention that the act, if applied to a married woman who continues to reside in the United States, exceeds the power of Congress.

And in harmony with MACKENZIE v. HARE is Re Martorana (1908) 159 Fed. 1010, which held that an American woman who married an alien was incompetent to be a voucher for a petitioner for naturalization as, under the act of March 2d, 1907, she became an alien by marrying an alien, even though she continued to reside in the United States and had no intention of residing elsewhere.

In Re Ciliberti (1911) 20 Pa. Dist. R. 489, application for a liquor license, where remonstrants alleged that the petitioner had become an alien by marrying a foreigner, it was held that, as the husband of the petitioner had resided in this country three years, and had made a bona fide declaration of becoming a citizen of the United States, he was not a foreigner within the meaning of the act of 1907, and so the petitioner, being an American citizen and intending so to remain, did not by her marriage lose her citizenship.

It will be observed that in both the opinion of the state court and of the United States Supreme Court in MACKENZIE v. HARE, it is stated that there was no evidence that the husband intended to become a citizen, but there is otherwise no allusion to the point in the argument of the courts. J. H. B.

Trademarks — territorial limitation.

1. The doctrine that trademarks are without territorial limitation means only that the right to protection against simulation is not limited to the territorial boundaries of municipalities or states or nations, but extends to every market where the trader's goods have become known and identified by his use of the mark; and not that a prior appropriation of a trademark entitles its appropriator to exclude others from using it, irrespective of the extent of his business territory.

Same — right to enjoin use of trademark outside of complainant's business territory.

2. The prior appropriator of the words "Tea Rose" as a trademark for flour is not entitled to enjoin the use of the same trademark, which has been adopted in good faith by a manufacturer of flour with no knowledge that anyone else was using or had used those words in such a connection, in a territory in which it has never sold its "Tea Rose" brand, and where the name has come to mean defendant's flour, and nothing else. *For other cases, see Injunction, I. m, in Dig. 1-52 N. A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, granting a preliminary injunction to restrain the infringement of a trademark. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Baker, Circuit Judge, and Anderson and Sanborn, District Judges.

Messrs. Henry Fitts, Edgar L. Clarkson, James E. Morrisette, and Louis Clements for appellants.

Messrs. L. O. Whitnel, H. L. Brownling, Thomas E. Gillespie, and J. Fred Gilster for appellee.

Baker, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a preliminary injunction. Bill, affidavits, counter affidavits, and exhibits disclose the following facts:

Complainant (appellee), an Ohio corporation, owns and operates a flour mill at Troy, Ohio. Since 1872 it has used the words "Tea Rose" as a common-law trademark to designate one of its makes of flour. Though its bill and affidavits say generally that its trade extended throughout the United States, the only particulars exhibited disclose that its trade was within the territory north of the Ohio river. And the showing of defendant clearly establishes, on the present record, that complainant never had any trade in its "Tea Rose" brand in the southeastern territory comprising Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Mississippi. In recent efforts to establish a trade in said southeastern territory, complainant has used only its "Trojan" and "Eldean Patent" brands. Complainant did not learn until in 1912, shortly before the bringing of this suit, that defendant had built up and was conducting an extensive trade in a "Tea Rose" brand of flour throughout said southeastern territory.

Defendant is an Illinois corporation, owning and operating a flour mill at Germantown, Illinois. Continuously since 1893 defendant has used the words "Tea Rose" in marking it flour sacks. Beginning in 1904 defendant conducted an active campaign to build up a large trade in its "Tea Rose" flour in said southeastern territory, with the result that when this suit was filed defendant's sales of "Tea Rose" flour in that market amounted to more than $150,000 a year. Defendant adopted "Tea Rose" as its mark in perfect good faith, with no knowledge that anyone else was using or had used those words in such a connection. In the flour trade in said southeastern territory the mark "Tea Rose" has come to mean defendant's flour, and nothing else.

Note. — As to territorial extent of right in trademark or tradename used in limited locality where used by another in a different locality, see annotation following this case post, 143.

If this were what is commonly known as an "unfair competition" case in distinction from a technical "trademark" case, complainant could not be given any relief for two reasons: (1) There is not and never has been any competition between the two flours in the same markets, hence no "unfair" competition, no palming off of defendant's flour as complainant's, no trespass committed or threatened upon complainant's established good will. And (2) if the words "Tea Rose" were open to common use, like the family name of the maker, or the geographical designation of the place of manufacture, or words descriptive of the grade of the goods, the make-ups of the two bags are so distinctive in color, lettering, wording, and names and addresses of makers, that, from a comparison alone, it could not be found that confusion would be likely to result. On the facts as now presented this case therefore turns on the correctness of complainant's insistence that, the words "Tea Rose" being proper for adoption as a technical trademark, and complainant having appropriated the mark and applied it to its flour, thereby complainant acquired the mark as its property, and had the right to exclude others from using it in the flour trade throughout the territory of the United States, irrespective of the questions of how far complainant's trade, reputation, and good will actually extended, and whether defendant had interfered or was threatening to interfere with complainant's established business.

Use of an arbitrary and distinctive mark to indicate the origin or ownership of articles of trade—the dealer's "commercial signature"—is very old. It may have begun because the general run of consumers of those ancient times could not have read the dealer's business name and address if he had written them upon his articles in the vernacular. And throughout, the question whether or not a trademark is property has often been mooted. Lord Langdale, in Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 73: "I own it does not L.R.A.1916D.

seem to me that a man can acquire a property merely in a name or mark." Vice Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood, in Collins Co. v. Brown, 3 Kay & J. 423: "It is now settled law that there is no property whatever in a trademark." Lord Herschell, in Reddaway v. Banham, [1896] A. C. 199, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 381, 74 L. T. N. S. 289, 44 Week. Rep. 638, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 193: "I doubt myself whether it is accurate to speak of there being property in a trademark." On the other hand, the books are full of cases in which, by implication or direct statement, it is declared that trademarks are property. But the dispute is only apparent; the minds of the various courts are found to be in accord when the basis of the cause of action and the reason for granting injunctive relief are considered.

In Perry v. Truefitt, supra: "I think that the principle on which both the courts of law and of equity proceed in granting relief and protection in cases of this sort is very well understood. A man is not to sell his own goods under the pretence that they are the goods of another man. He cannot be permitted to practise such a deception, nor to use the means which contribute to that end. He cannot, therefore, be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia, by which he may induce purchasers to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person."

In Collins Co. v. Brown, supra: "A person may acquire a right of using a particular mark for articles which he has manufactured, so that he may be able to prevent any other person from using it, because the mark denotes that articles so marked were manufactured by a certain person; and no one else can have a right to put the same mark on his goods, and thus to represent them to have been manufactured by the person who originally used that particular mark. That would be a fraud upon the person who first used the mark in the market where his goods are sold. The simplest case is where a man puts his name and address on the goods which he manufactures; it would be unlawful for another manufacturer to put that name and address on his goods, because to do so would be to give to all the world the impression that they were manufactured by the person whose name and address they bore.

"The simple question in these cases is: Has the plaintiff, by the appropriation of a particular mark, fixed in the market where his goods are sold a conviction that the goods so marked were manufactured by him; and if so, and if no one else has been in the habit of using that mark, another man has not the right to use that mark, so as to commit the fraudulent act of palming off his own goods as being the goods of the person who is known to have been in the habit of using it."

So it is evident that those who deny that trademarks are property agree with the others that complainants are entitled to protection in the use of trademarks. And both sides meet in finding that the cause of action is the injury done or threatened to a complainant's trade in which he has used the marks in question to designate the origin or ownership of his goods, and that the appropriate relief is to enjoin the defendant from using the marks to divert trade that otherwise would have gone or would go to the complainant. Whether trademarks are accurately called property or not, it is clear that some of the rights that are incident to property do attach to them; and therefore, just as courts sometimes state jurisdictional facts by describing corporation parties as "citizens," it may be convenient to speak of trademarks as "property," as a short way of expressing a limited truth that requires ampler means for a complete and accurate statement. And that limited truth is as compactly defined as anywhere else in Weston v. Ketcham, 51 How. Pr. 455: "There is no such thing as a trademark in 'gross,' to use that term by analogy. It must be 'appendant' of some particular business in which it is actually used upon or in regard to specific articles."

It is not the trademark, but the trade, the business reputation, and good will, that is injured; and the property or right in the trade is protected from injury by preventing a fraud-doer from stealing the complainant's trade by means of using the complainant's "commercial signature."

From these considerations of the nature of trademarks and the basis and scope of trademark suits, it would follow that complainant in this case has no property in the mark "Tea Rose," like property in its mill and wheat and flour; has no monopoly of the use of the mark, like the monopoly of a patent or a copyright; has no right at all to the mark "in gross," but a right only to the extent that the mark is "appendant" to its trade; has no basis of complaint except for injury to its business; and (since defendant has traded honestly in markets where complainant is unknown, and has neither committed nor threatened an injury to complainant's reputation and good will) has no cause of action in equity. But complainant nevertheless relies upon expressions to the effect that trademarks are without "territorial limitation," are the exclusive property of their first adopters throughout the sovereignty within which they were L.R.A.1916D.

anywhere applied by them to articles of commerce, and contends that the "unfair competition" cases in which the concurrent use of marks or names not susceptible of adoption as technical trademarks was permitted, provided fraud and deception were sufficiently guarded against, have no application. It is proper, therefore, to inquire: What is the nature of the differences between "unfair competition" and "technical trademark" cases? And in what sense, if any, is it true that trademarks have no territorial limitations?

When suits were based solely upon the fraudulent use of technical trademarks, very frequently the controversies were confined to the defense that the marks in question were not susceptible of exclusive appropriation. Under the influence of the fact that the upholding of that defense would defeat a "trademark" suit, courts have sustained as "trademark" cases many that to-day would probably be classed as "unfair competition." But complainants soon began to reply: If it be true that these marks have no primary signification that we are the originators or owners of the articles so marked, nevertheless consumers in the markets where our goods are sold have come to recognize them as ours by means of these marks, which have thus acquired a secondary meaning that points to us as originators or owners, and the defendant has no more equitable right to use that mark in its secondary meaning than any mark of primary meaning as a mask for robbing us of our trade. This reply called sharp attention to the foundation of the "trademark" suit and the reason for granting injunctive relief, and it was seen that, inasmuch as the trade, not the mark, was the property involved, and that the remedy was to stop the defendant's dishonesty in trade, it was immaterial whether the fraud-doer was filching trade by means of using others' marks in their primary meaning, or others' marks in their secondary meaning, or others' real names or nicknames, or simulated dress, or merely oral misrepresentations apart from all marks, names, or dress upon the articles. 38 Cyc. 680 and 756, and cases cited.

If a dealer adopts an arbitrary mark that is then meaningless in trade, his application of it to his article creates its only meaning. He is entitled to protection in the use of that meaning as appendant to his trade. If a dealer marks his shaving soap by the family name of "Williams," or his ale by the name of the village of "Stone," or his starch by the name of the hamlet of "Glenfield," his application of the name does not create its only meaning; but, if his trade creates a new meaning for the name, then he is entitled to just as full protection in the use of that meaning as if that were the only one. Others may use the common word in its common meaning, but they cannot use it in the particular meaning created by the complainant.

In both the "trademark" and the "unfair competition" cases the ground of the action and the reason for the remedy are identical. They are all cases of unfair competition in trade, and the remedy is to tie the hands of the unfair trader. To the extent that differences exist, they pertain, not to the underlying principle, but to the methods and degrees of proof required to enforce the principle. If a dealer has adopted a true trademark, his trade has given the mark its only meaning, and he need produce no other proof respecting meaning. If he has applied to his article a mark or name that had an existing meaning, it is incumbent on him to establish the fact that his trade has added a new meaning that is exclusively appendant to his trade. If a defendant has put into a common market his articles bearing another dealer's technical trademark, no further proof of fraud is required. If a defendant has put into a common market his articles bearing a mark or name that had a common meaning, the complainant must show that the defendant is using the mark or name, not in its common meaning, but in its new meaning created by the complainant. In "trademark" cases, it is sometimes said that proof of fraudulent intent need not be made. This is hardly accurate; the truth being that proof of knowing use carries proof of intent. In "unfair competition" cases, it is sometimes said that proof of actual intent must be furnished. But if by this it is declared that to uncover the defendant's malevolent purpose is enough, the statement goes too far, for an intention to filch business, unaccompanied by any efficient means, is not actionable. The intent that makes the defendant liable is the intent that is found in his proven acts. Now, inasmuch as these differences, and any others we have ever noticed, relate to the methods and degrees of proof, and not to the nature and principle of the suit, it follows that "unfair competition" cases are applicable to the determination of the nature and principle of this suit. And in "unfair competition" cases, "of course there must be actual competition before there can be any unfair competition." 38 Cyc. 760, and notes. And since a "trademark" suit is an "unfair competition" suit in nature and principle, complainant in this suit has no standing because there is no competition.

in point on the question: In what sense, if any, is it true that trademarks have no territorial limitations?

In Levy v. Waitt, 25 L.R.A. 190, 10 C. C. A. 227, 21 U. S. App. 394, 61 Fed. 1008, Levy was the elder adopter of the word "Blackstone" (geographical) as a brand for cigars. At the time of the suit Levy had a large trade in his Blackstone cigars in New York and the West, and Waitt had built up an extensive business in his Blackstones in New England. Waitt adopted the word "Blackstone" without knowledge of its previous use by Levy. Before Waitt established his New England trade, Levy had sold some of his Blackstone cigars in New England. But the sales were few and intermittent and resulted in no trade. To New England dealers and consumers the word Blackstone pointed to Waitt as the maker. Inasmuch as Levy had no property right in the brand except as appendant to his trade,—no property right beyond insisting that the public be not deceived to the injury of his trade,—he had no rights against Waitt in New England, whatever might be his rights in the use of that brand against Waitt or others elsewhere.

In Cohen v. Nagle, 190 Mass. 4, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 966, 76 N. E. 276, 5 Ann. Cas. 553, the complainant Cohen adopted the word "Keystone" to identify a brand of his cigars, and built up a large trade therein throughout New England. He believed that he was the originator of the word as applied to cigars; but, before his time, the word was used as a brand in the cigar business in the Middle and Western states. Defendant Nagle, after Cohen had established his New England trade, began marketing in New England Keystone cigars which he purchased from a manufacturer in Pennsylvania, where it was claimed that the manufacturer had a lawful right to use that word as a brand for cigars. The trial court protected Cohen by an injunction limited territorially to New England. On appeal the decree was affirmed, the majority holding that, inasmuch as Cohen had not taken a cross appeal, no question whether he had trade rights beyond the limits of his trade was before the court. Three justices expressed the view that Cohen's trade rights did not extend beyond the limits of his trade.

Carroll, in Maryland, and McIlvaine, in New York (C. C.) 171 Fed. 125, had each in his locality established a trade in Baltimore Club whisky. About thirty years later Carroll extended his trade to New York, and sought to stop McIlvaine on the ground that Carroll was the originator of the brand. It was held in substance that, conceding priority to Carroll, and independently of whether the brand was a technical trademark or merely a tradename, Carroll was not entitled to an injunction, because it was not Carroll's prior appropriation of the mark or name, but his prior appropriation of trade through the use of the mark or name, that was to be protected.

These cases indicate to us that it is true in a sense that trademarks are without territorial limitation; but not in the sense meant by complainant. The sense we perceive is one that goes back to the foundational purpose of the trademark suit. Since it is the trade, and not the mark, that is to be protected, a trademark acknowledges no territorial boundaries of municipalities or states or nations, but extends to every market where the trader's goods have become known and identified by his use of the mark. But the mark, of itself, cannot travel to markets where there is no article to wear the badge and no trader to offer the article.

Contrary to this view, certain cases are to be noticed.

In Derringer v. Plate, 29 Cal. 292, 87 Am. Dec. 170, Derringer was a manufacturer of pistols at Philadelphia, Plate at San Francisco. This statement appears in the opinion: "The manufacturer at Philadelphia, who has adopted and uses a trademark, has the same right of property in it at New York or San Francisco that he has at his place of manufacture."

Yes, if Derringer was selling his pistols in the San Francisco market or any market where Plate was trying to palm off his pistols as Derringer's; and we find nothing in the report to show that such was not the fact.

In Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 25 L. ed. 769, Johnson was the assignee of the property and good will, including a trademark, of a distillery business at Cincinnati. Kidd was causing whisky to be sold in New Orleans under the same trademark. Johnson obtained in the United States circuit court for the district of Louisiana an injunction, which was affirmed on appeal. The question was the validity and extent of the assignment of the trademark. Among other things, the court said: "That transfer was plainly designed to confer whatever right Pike possessed. It, in terms, extends the use of the trademark to Mills, Johnson, & Company, and their successors. Such use, to be of any value, must necessarily be exclusive. If others also could use it, the trademark would be of no service in distinguishing the whisky of the manufacturer in Cincinnati; and thus the company [the assignee of the business and the mark] would lose all the benefit arising from the reputation the whisky there manufactured had acquired in the market. The right to use the trademark is not limited to any place, city, or state, and therefore must be deemed to extend everywhere. Such is the uniform construction of licenses to use patented inventions. If the owner imposes no limitation of place or time, the right to use is deemed co-extensive with the whole country, and perpetual."

Complainant lays stress on the sentence we have italicized. But the context shows, we think, that trademarks were not classed with patent monopolies; that the comparison was between the assignments, not the things assigned; that, inasmuch as Pike had given an unrestricted assignment, "the (assignee's) right to use the trademark is not limited to any place;" that, though the distillery was located at Cincinnati, the good will of the business and the trademark as the badge thereof could extend throughout the country; and that, since the thing to be protected was "the reputation the whisky there manufactured (at Cincinnati) had acquired in the market," an injunction should be granted to keep the pirate Kidd out of any market in which the whisky had acquired a reputation. And nothing in the reported case indicates that the genuine Pike's Magnolia Whisky was not sold and well known in the New Orleans market.

In Griggs, C. & Co. v. Erie Preserving Co. (C. C.) 131 Fed. 359, complainant was a wholesale grocer at St. Paul, dealing in canned goods under the common-law trademark, "Home Brand," adopted in 1889, and having a trade extending through Minnesota, Wisconsin, North and South Dakota, and Montana. Defendant later came into the same territory and undermined complainant's trade by use of the same mark. In 1877 Fry & Company, a Pennsylvania corporation, had adopted the identical mark, and in 1885 and 1892 registered the mark under the numbers 11,850 and 20,913. Complainant, learning this in 1900, took a license or limited assignment from Fry to use this registered trademark in said northwestern territory. The extent of Fry's trade is not stated; but, seemingly, complainant, in establishing its trade, had not come into collision with Fry. At any rate, Fry's license or assignment does not profess to convey to complainant Fry's business, reputation, and good will, or any part thereof; and throughout the territory in question the mark "Home Brand" pointed exclusively to complainant as producer. On the ground that Fry's license or assignment of the registered mark gave complainant an exclusive proprietary interest in Home Brand within said northwestern territory, the defendant was enjoined. The decree, we believe, is sustainable on the underlying principle of the trademark suit and on the analogies of the Blackstone, Keystone, and Baltimore Club cases. But, in looking to the decision as authority for complainant's proposition that a trademark has an existence independent of the trade to which it is appendant, we suggest that the registry statute does not purport to create a new right, but only to regulate a pre-existing right; that the regulation is confined to commerce with foreign nations and Indian tribes, and does not touch the interstate and intrastate commerce in which the parties to the suit were competing; and that the cases of Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 25 L. ed. 769, and Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. Fish Bros. Mfg. Co. 37 C. C. A. 146, 95 Fed. 457, as we read them, are not authorities for the proposition that Fry's license or limited assignment of the registered trademark, unaccompanied by any transfer of business and good will, was effectual to give complainant a monopolistic right in Home Brand in interstate and intrastate commerce in said northwestern territory.

Hygeia Distilled Water Co. v. Consolidated Ice Co. (C. C.) 144 Fed. 139, is a case wherein the complainant, beginning in 1885, built up a trade in distilled water under the trademark "Hygeia" in the territory of New York and "other states" unnamed. In 1890 defendant innocently adopted the same trademark for its distilled water, and acquired a trade in "Pittsburgh and the surrounding territory." Each party remained in ignorance of the other and its doings until 1904, shortly before the start of the suit, when complainant's counsel notified defendant to quit. Down to that time, therefore, the mark "Hygeia" was a warrant to the consumers in Pittsburgh and vicinity that defendant was the producer of the water they wanted. The injunction against defendant consequently involves the proposition that complainant, by adopting the mark in 1885 and then applying it to its product in New York, acquired a monopoly of the mark, good for nineteen years and all the years, and dominant in the Pittsburgh market and all the markets of the United States, irrespective of the extent to which complainant had entered the markets. The opinion disposes of the question by saying that complainant's right to an injunction is not affected by "the fact that complainant has not, up to this time, extended its trade to the locality occupied by the respondent," and by citing Derringer v. Plate, 29 Cal. 296, 87 Am. Dec. 170, and Hopkins, Trademarks, § 13.

Derringer v. Plate has already been considered. In § 13 of Hopkins the general L.R.A.1916D.

statement is not made that a trademark has no territorial limitation, but, "unlike a patent, a trademark has no territorial limitation." If by this it is meant that a patent is a sovereign grant and has no force beyond the territorial limits of the sovereignty, while a trademark, which is of a different nature, is not restricted by the bounds of states or nations or continents, but goes wherever the trade to which it is appendant goes, the statement affords complainant no comfort. And that such was the intended meaning seems to be evidenced by the citation of Collins Co. v. Cohen, 3 Kay & J. 428, as supportive of the text. In that case complainant Collins was an American manufacturer who had a large trade and a high reputation not only in the United States, but also in various foreign countries, including Cuba and Australia; but no factory, no trade, no good will, no marks, registered or unregistered, in England. Defendant was a manufacturer at Sheffield, England, who was exporting his goods to Cuba and Australia and there undermining complainant's trade by using complainant's commercial signature. One of the defenses was that, as complainant had no trade rights in England that had been trespassed upon by the defendant in England, the case in England was not maintainable. It was also argued that there was nothing to show that the laws of Cuba and Australia did not allow traders to cheat others by palming off goods under forged commercial signatures. Vice Chancellor Wood replied: "I apprehend that every subject of every country, not being an alien enemy,—and even to an alien enemy the court has extended relief in cases of fraud,—has a right to apply to this court to have a fraudulent injury to his property arrested. And here the plaintiffs have the right—a right recognized, I imagine, everywhere in the world, or at least in every civilized community—of saying, 'We, being the manufacturers of certain goods, claim that another man shall not manufacture goods and put upon them our trademark and then pass them off as manufactured by us.'"<sup>1</sup>

We find nothing in conscience or in reason or in persuasive precedents that should induce us to permit complainant to dominate the southeastern markets in question, where "Tea Rose" means defendant, and thus absorb or take over the valuable trade that defendant in good faith has built up in virgin territory. If this may be done, then the trademark doctrine, which started out to prevent defendants from deceiving consumers to complainants' injury, has come to protect complainants in deceiving consumers to complainants' advantage, at the expense of defendants.

If the junior has not established his trade in good faith, or, if having appropriated certain markets in an honest belief, he should attempt to forestall the elder trader by hastening into markets the elder was arranging to occupy, it might be that equity would have no difficulty in recognizing an inchoate right in the elder to precedence and dominance, for honesty and fair dealing should always be a strong appeal to conscience; but no such questions are here, because, on the present record, defendant's honesty and fairness stand unquestionable.

Another route leads to the same destination: If complainant has trade rights irrespective of the existence of its trade, whence do they come? Monopolies are in derogation of common right; they are special privileges. Every lawful monopoly is a grant from the sovereign to a selected favorite, designated by person or by class. Ohio, complainant's sovereign state, has not by Constitution or statute granted it a monopoly of the use of the mark. The Federal government has constitutional authority to grant monopolies for limited times to inventors and authors; but complainant is neither, and a trademark may endure forever. How far Congress might go under the commerce clause (Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, 25 L. ed. 550; Sarrazin v. W. R. Irby Cigar & Tobacco Co. 46 L.R.A. 541, 35 C. C. A. 496, 93 Fed. 624), it is needless to inquire, for the Federal statute is not concerned with the commerce in which these parties were engaged. So, if the monopoly here sought is the creature of law, it must be of the common law. First. Trade rights were not created by the common law. They are a part of man's natural rights. Man preceded the common law, which recognized, but did not create, the rights he was theretofore exercising. The most the common law did was to regulate their use, or, rather, to adopt and enforce the usages of honest commerce. If, because the common law recognizes and regulates a man's right to trade, it be claimed that the common law created the right, then the common law might also be called the author of his life, liberty, and happiness. And if it be said that a man has a "monopoly" in L.R.A.1916D.

his own life or liberty or trade, then the word is wrongly used. Second. But if a monopoly in a trademark is created or affirmatively granted by the common law, by what common law? We need not consider the mooted question whether, generally, there is a common law of the United States, or whether the common law administered by the Federal courts in the several districts is the common law of the respective states, for, with regard to the common law of trademarks, it is settled that the right does not arise under "the Constitution and laws of the United States." If it did so arise, the Federal courts, regardless of the citizenship of the parties, would have jurisdiction to protect the right throughout the territory of the United States. Elgin Nat. Watch Co. v. Illinois Watch Case Co. 179 U. S. 665, 45 L. ed. 365, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270; Warner v. Searle & H. Co. 191 U. S. 202, 48 L. ed. 146, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 79. If not created by the Federal law, then the supposed monopoly must have been created by the law of Ohio; and, if so, complainant's monopoly created by that law can have no extraterritorial effect.

Though an order granting or denying a preliminary injunction will not be disturbed except for an abuse of discretion, a proper discretion does not include the misapplication of the law to conceded facts. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. v. Olmsted, 121 C. C. A. 615, 203 Fed. 493.

A further reason appears why complainant's showing did not justify the issuance of an injunction. Defendant proved that complainant's sales of flour in the territory in question were made under the brands "Trojan" and "Eldean Patent." If this was the same flour as its "Tea Rose," made from the same wheat and taken from the same flour bins, to permit complainant to add "Tea Rose" flour would simply tend to confuse trade in those markets, or only come to indicate a difference of grade that did not exist. Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 467, 37 L. ed. 1144, 1147, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151. Complainant, necessarily knowing the whole truth respecting this matter, did not meet the situation exhibited by defendant.

The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, March 6, 1916, in 240 U. S. 403, 60 L. ed. —, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357.

Annotation—Territorial extent of right in trademark or tradename used in limited locality where used by another in a different locality.

This note supplements a note on the same subject appended to Eastern Outfitting Co. v. Manheim, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 251.

The rule stated in the earlier note that a right may be acquired in different localities by different persons to use the same trademark or tradename for the same purpose finds support in the holding of HANOVER STAR MILL CO. v. ALLEN & W. CO. ante, 136, which was affirmed by the Federal Supreme Court (1916) 240 U. S. 403, 60 L. ed. —, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357. In the latter court the rule is stated that "into whatever markets the use of a trademark has extended, or its meaning has become known, there will the manufacturer or trader whose trade is pirated by an infringing use be entitled to protection and redress. But this is not to say that the proprietor of a trademark, good in the markets where it has been employed, can monopolize markets that his trade has never reached, and where the mark signifies not his goods, but those of another." In further amplification of this latter statement, in the former part of the opinion it is said that "where two parties independently are employing the same mark upon goods of the same class, but in separate markets, wholly remote the one from the other, the question of prior appropriation is legally insignificant; unless, at least, it appear that the second adopter has selected the mark with some design inimical to the interests of the first user, such as to take the benefit of the reputation of his goods, to forestall the extension of his trade, or the like."

The court reversed on this point Metcalf v. Hanover Star Mill Co. (1912) 122 C. C. A. 483, 204 Fed. 211, a case involving the same trademark as that involved in the case under annotation. Protection to the trademark was denied by the circuit court of appeals on the ground that the plaintiff had no exclusive right thereto, and the defendant was not guilty of unfair competition. The Federal Supreme Court on this point held that, as against the defendant in that case, the plaintiff was entitled to relief on the ground of unfair competition.

In disposing of the general question of the territorial scope of trademarks, Mr. Justice Holmes, in a concurring opinion in the Federal Supreme Court case referred to, points out that a trademark or tradename in territorial scope should be state wide, but that it should not extend beyond the state lines except as it receives recognition in other states. Hence, if a mark has been used and given a reputation in one state, that state may well say that those who have spent their money innocently in giving it its local value are not to be defeated by proof that others have used the mark earlier in another jurisdiction more or less remote.

The doctrine that a trademark will be protected only to the extent of territory where it has been used was applied in Thomas J. Carroll & Son Co. v. McIlvaine & Baldwin (1910) 105 C. C. A. 314, 183 Fed. 22, where the original appropriator of a trademark for goods sold in Baltimore and vicinity, on the ground of laches, was denied the right to enjoin the use by another of the same trademark on a similar class of goods in the city of New York and vicinity, where the subsequent appropriation was in good faith and had been applied to the goods for some years before the proceeding in question was taken. This was also the doctrine of B. Payn's Sons Tobacco Co. v. Payette (1914) 86 Misc. 276, 149 N. Y. Supp. 183, affirmed without opinion in (1915) — App. Div. —, 155 N. Y. Supp. 1095, wherein the court refused to enjoin the use by defendant of a trademark on cigars in a different locality from that in which the plaintiff had used it to designate his brand of cigars. Both of these localities were within the state.

And in Dominion Flour Mills Co. v. Morris (1912) — Ont. —, 2 D. L. R. 830, a plaintiff was denied the right to protection of a trademark to designate its product, where the same mark was used in other sections of the country by other manufacturers to designate a similar product, without any intention of passing off the same as the product of the plaintiff, and with an equal claim with the plaintiff to an independent right of user.

And in further support of this doctrine see C. A. Briggs Co. v. National Wafer Co. (1913) 215 Mass. 100, 102 N. E. 87, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 926, an unfair competition case, wherein the court refused to protect a trademark beyond the extent of territory in which the plaintiff had actually used it to designate his product. And see also W. A. Gaines &

Co. v. Rock Springs Distilling Co. (1915) — C. C. A. —, 226 Fed. 531, wherein the two conflicting theories as to trademark protection as to territorial scope are stated, but the court finds it unnecessary to determine which of them is the correct doctrine.

In a recent tradename case, Kaufman v. Kaufman (1916) 223 Mass. 104, 111 N. E. 691, in denying relief to one retailer against the use of his tradename by another retailer in a different section of the same state, the doctrine is stated that "the plaintiff is entitled to relief only on the ground of unfair trade competition or interference with his established rights. The tradename and symbols of the plaintiff cannot extend into regions where his goods are not sold, where he has no customers, and where he has no trade. There can be no recovery unless it appears that there has been a wrongful appropriation by the defendant of trade which belonged to the plaintiff. The mere use of a tradename which one person has found highly successful in bringing his goods to the favorable attention of the public in one business territory, by another person in another business territory, constitutes no actionable wrong. Actual or probable deception of the public to the harm of the plaintiff is the basis of the action. There can be no unfair competition unless the plaintiff is actually a rival for the trade which the defendant secures."

In Pflugh v. Eagle White Lead Co. (1911) 107 C. C. A. 659, 185 Fed. 769, writ of certiorari denied in (1911) 220 U. S. 615, 55 L. ed. 610, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719, a name used as a trademark and tradename was denied protection as to territory in which the defendant had been the first user as a trademark for similar goods. The court said that the plaintiff did not have the exclusive right to the use of the trademark, owing to its use by others in different sections of the country, and that having acquiesced for years in its use by other manufacturers on a similar product, it was estopped to assert the right to the exclusive use of the word as a trademark or tradename.

On this point attention is called to the opinion of the Federal Supreme Court, already referred to, wherein it is said that the rule that property in a trademark is not limited in its enjoyment by territorial bounds, but may be asserted and protected wherever the law affords a remedy for wrongs, is true in a limited sense, "but the mark of itself cannot travel to markets where there is no article to wear the badge and no trader to offer the article." L.R.A.1916D.

Rescission — release — fraud.

2. A settlement and release of a cause of action induced and procured by false representations of material facts, the falsity of which was unknown to the person making them, may be rescinded and avoided, though there was no fraudulent or other wrongful intent to deceive or defraud.

For other cases, see Release, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — statements by physician.

3. Plaintiff was injured while a passer per on one of defendant's trains. Soon after defendant's physician made a physical examination of plaintiff's person, and, to induce or cause him to act thereon, represented that he had suffered no serious injury, had no broken bones, and would recover in the course of two or three weeks. It is held that the representations were material, plaintiff had the right to rely thereon in effecting a settlement with defendant, and, since the representations were untrue in fact, though the falsity was not known to the physician at the time, and were not made with intent to deceive, plaintiff had the right to rescind the settlement. Such facts constitute fraud in law.

For other cases, see Release, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — instructions.

4. The instructions of the trial court upon the question of expert opinion evidence held not prejudicial to the rights of defendant.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. m, 4, a, (4), in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APP<sup>E</sup>AL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Blue Earth County denying a new trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. J. Laurisch and Webber & Lees, for appellant:

The special findings submitted by the court furnished absolutely no information, and where special findings are submitted they should be so framed as to constitute a finding of fact which would support a recovery.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for personal injuries in which plaintiff had a verdict, and defendant appealed from an order denying a new trial.

Plaintiff was a passenger upon one of defendant's accommodation trains running between Wells and Mankato. The train was wrecked and plaintiff was injured. The accident occurred on July 5, 1913, and plaintiff was removed to a hospital at Mankato, where he was given treatment by the defendant's local physician. On July 7th, two days after the injury, and when plaintiff was still at the hospital, a claim agent representing defendant called upon him and effected a settlement, paying to plaintiff in full for his injuries $150. Plaintiff signed and delivered the usual formal release. It was represented to him at the time of the settlement by the company physician, and also by the claim agent, that his injuries were not serious, and that he would fully recover within three or four weeks. Within a few days thereafter plaintiff left the hospital and returned to his home at Mapleton, some 25 miles from Mankato. It appears that he was unable to walk unassisted, and defendant's physician supplied him with a pair of crutches. He thereafter occasionally returned to Mankato for further treatment, but, not recovering as rapidly as represented by the physician, he applied, on August 4th, to other physicians for relief. A thorough examination was made, an X-ray photograph taken of his back and hips, and the new physicians discovered what they termed an impacted fracture of the neck of the femur of the left leg, an injury to the sacroiliac joint, a curvature of the spine, and a shortening of one of the legs. Thereupon he brought an action against the company to recover for his injuries, claiming that the settlement and release were obtained by fraud. That action was transferred to the Federal court, where, after trial, it was dismissed without prejudice, and thereupon plaintiff brought the present action, joining therein the engineer and conductor of the train as parties defendant. When the cause was called for trial, defendant company conceded liability for the injuries sustained by plaintiff, but claimed that settlement therefor had been made, and the sole issue litigated, aside from the nature and character of the injuries and the question of damages, was whether the release was obtained by fraud. The action was dismissed as to the individual defendants.

The assignments of error challenge the ruling of the court in refusing to submit to the jury certain special questions in the language and form requested by defendant, and certain of its instructions and refusals to instruct the jury. We dispose of these in their order.

1. At the conclusion of the trial, counsel for defendant requested the court to submit to the jury certain special questions embodying the issue whether either the claim agent or the defendant's physician at the time of the settlement made any false and fraudulent statements as to the character of plaintiff's injuries with intent to deceive and defraud him, and if such statements were found by the jury to have been made to indicate what they were. The court refused to submit the question in the form presented, but did submit two distinct questions embodying the substance of those presented by the defendant with the exception that the intent to deceive was eliminated, and the jury was not required to state what the false statements were. In point of substance the special question submitted called for the general conclusion whether any false and fraudulent statements were made to bring about the settlement. The contention is that, though it was discretionary with the court to submit or not submit special issues to the jury (Morrow v. St. Paul City R. Co. 74 Minn. 480, 77 N. W. 303), having decided to submit them, they should have been so framed as to require the jury to state in their answer the facts called for by the questions proposed by defendant, and that, since the questions in fact submitted called only for the general conclusions of the jury, there was an abuse of discretion entitling defendant to a new trial. In this we do not concur. As conceded by counsel, the question whether special issue shall be submitted to a jury in a case of this kind rests wholly in the discretion of the court. The matter so resting with the trial court, it necessarily follows that the form of the question or issue to be so submitted rests also in its discretion, in the exercise of which in this case we discover no substantial reasons for serious criticism. 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 667. Decisions from courts of those states where by statute special issues are required to be submitted to the jury are not in point.

2. Defendant requested the court to charge the jury that fraud and intention to deceive were necessary ingredients of plaintiff's cause of action in so far as the validity of the release was concerned, and that, unless the jury found that the statements made to plaintiff at the time of the settlement, by the physician and claim agent, as to the nature and character of plaintiff's injuries, were made with a knowledge of their falsity and with intent to deceive plaintiff, the release could not be set aside, and plaintiff must fail in the action. The court refused to so instruct, and it may be conceded that the general charge did not include the element of intentional deception.

The physician of the company testified that soon after plaintiff was taken to the hospital he made a careful examination of his body with a view of determining the nature and character of his injuries, as a result of which he found no broken bones, and that the only injury suffered by plaintiff was in the form of bruises, from which he would soon recover. At the time of the accident plaintiff was seated in the accommodation coach of the train. This was derailed, and for some distance passed over the cross-ties, and violently bumped up and down until it came to a stop. Whatever injuries plaintiff received came from this violent bumping as the car passed over the ties. A fellow passenger received a dislocated ankle. The theory of plaintiff's case was that this violence resulted in an impacted fracture of the femur and dislocation of the sacroiliac joint. The company's physician did not discover either injury, if either existed, by his examination. He advised the claim agent that plaintiff had no serious injury, and plaintiff testified that he stated to him at the time he introduced the claim agent: "He told me I was just bruised a little; that I would be well in ten days or two weeks, and capable of going to work; that I didn't have any broken bones; and that I had better go ahead and settle."

The physician denied having advised plaintiff to go ahead and settle with the claim agent, though he admitted that he stated to plaintiff that he had no broken bones, had been bruised only, and would be well and able to go to work in two or three weeks. The same representations were made by the claim agent. Plaintiff further testified that in making the settlement he relied upon such statements and representations, and believed the same to be true, and the record will not justify the conclusion that he was chargeable with negligence in acting thereon.

Defendant's contention is that to entitle plaintiff to rescind the release it was incumbent upon him to show that he was induced to execute it by the intentional deception of the physician and claim agent, and that the court erred in not so charging the jury. We do not sustain the point. It may be conceded that an essential element of the old common-law action of deceit is intentional fraud and deception, and that, as a general rule, no recovery can be had in such an action where intentional deception does not appear. And there are many authorities holding to a strict application of the rule, and as requiring an affirmative showing of an intent to defraud and deceive in all cases where relief is sought on the ground of fraudulent representations. As thus strictly applied, much injustice has resulted, and the courts have ingrafted upon the rule modifications and qualifications, and the present trend of judicial opinion does not require in all cases a showing of an evil intent. The injury suffered by the defrauded party may be just as great whether the fraud was intentional or unintentional. So in actions the result of which places the parties in statu quo, restoring to each what he parted with, equity will grant relief where the representations which induced and brought about the contract were, in fact, false, though made in good faith; the additional requirement being that the representations must appear to have been material, not mere opinion, and of a character to justify reliance thereon by the defrauded party. In such cases the courts grant relief either upon the ground of fraud in law, sometimes spoken of as constructive fraud, or mutual mistake. It is not material whether it be termed fraud in law or mistake; the result is the same in either case. The rule now often applied is tersely summed up by the Iowa supreme court in the statement that "a party cannot falsely assert a fact to be true and induce another to rely upon such statement to his prejudice, and thereafter hide behind a claim that he did not know it was false at the time he asserted it." Haigh v. White Way Laundry Co. 104 Iowa, 143, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1091, 145 N. W. 473.

The rule has frequently been stated and applied in our former decisions, both in actions for a rescission of the contract and where the alleged fraud has been presented as defensive matter. Dunnell's Dig. 3819; Drake v. Fairmont Drain Tile & Brick Co. 129 Minn. 145, 151 N. W. 914; Brooks v. Hamilton, 15 Minn. 26, Gil. 10; Hedin v. Minneapolis Medical & S. Inst. 62 Minn. 146, 35 L.R.A. 417, 54 Am. St. Rep. 628, 64 N. W. 158; Busterud v. Farrington, 36 Minn. 320, 31 N. W. 360. It was held in Bullitt v. Farrar, 42 Minn. 8, 6 L.R.A. 149, 18 Am. St. Rep. 485, 43 N. W. 566, that it is a fraud for one to make an unqualified representation not knowing whether it is true or false, and that an unqualified statement amounts to an affirmation as of one's own knowledge. Numerous decisions in other states support the same doctrine. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 94; Holcomb v. Noble, 69 Mich. 396, 37 N. W. 497; Johnson v. Gulick, 46 Neb. 817, 50 Am. St. Rep. 629, 65 N. W. 883; Pattison v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 55 Wash. 625, 104 Pac. 825; Carroll v. United R. Co. 157 Mo. App. 247, 137 S. W. 303; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Maples, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 426; Kathan v. Comstock, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201, and cases cited in note (140 Wis. 427, 122 N. W. 1044). In the case at bar the physician representing defendant made a physical examination of plaintiff a short time after the accident. Upon the examination so made he represented to plaintiff the facts heretofore stated, which were repeated by the claim agent. The jury was fully justified in finding that the representations were, in fact, untrue, though not intentionally so, and that they were made to induce a settlement of plaintiff's claim for damages. Plaintiff relied, and had the right to rely, upon the representations, and the jury properly found that he was induced thereby to make the settlement and sign the release. This brings the case within the rule of the authorities cited. The representations, aside from the statement that no bones were broken, were of matters of substance, and not the mere opinion of the physician. Marple v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 115 Minn. 262, 132 N.W. 333, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1082. The trial court was therefore not in error in refusing the requested instructions that an intention to deceive was an essential to plaintiff's right to recover, nor was there error in the refusal of the request to the effect that, if the jury found that plaintiff suffered no broken bones, he could not recover.

3. Defendant complains of certain of the instructions of the court relative to the expert opinion evidence. While the court unnecessarily extended its remarks upon this subject beyond what the character of the experts or nature of the case would seem to have justified, yet we find no sufficient reason for holding that defendant was substantially prejudiced thereby. The remarks of the court were general, and applied with equal force to the medical experts called by both parties. The case would perhaps be different had defendant produced the only experts, and upon their opinions based its defense. Plaintiff's case rested largely upon the opinions of such experts, and there was, as usually occurs in such a case, a square conflict in the opinions of those called by plaintiff and those called by defendant. And when the court said to the jury that they were not to accept the opinions of such witnesses, based upon an assumed state of facts, and not upon a direct knowledge of the facts, "unless it comports and agrees with your common sense and is consistent with the facts proven in the case, as such facts are determined by you from a fair preponderance of all the evidence in the case," the court went no further in point of substance than did the charge of the court in Moratzky v. Wirth, 74 Minn. 146, 76 N. W. 1032, where the instructions were held not error. Plaintiff was injured at the time the train upon which he was a passenger was wrecked, and of this there is no controversy. The nature and character of those injuries presented the principal inquiry on the trial. The physicians called to treat him after he left the hospital and the care of defendant's physician thoroughly examined him a month or six weeks thereafter, took an X-ray of his hip and back, and discovered what they declared was an impacted fracture of the femur, a dislocation of the sacroiliac joint, and a curvature of the spine. They produced the photograph at the trial and pointed out the fracture, and expressed the opinion that all the injuries resulted from the wreck. After quitting the hospital plaintiff returned to his home, and was about his place doing such work as he was able to do, but he did not recover, and there was at the trial no question but that he is now permanently crippled. The physicians called by defendant also examined plaintiff, and expressed the opinion that the injuries complained of were the result of disease, tubercular in character, and not the result of the wreck. They found no evidence of an impacted fracture of the femur, and were of opinion that, if plaintiff suffered such a fracture, he could not have gone about his work on the farm; that it would have been impossible for him to do so. Plaintiff's experts did not agree to this, and expressed opinions to the contrary. Plaintiff had for some time prior to the accident suffered from some ailment in his left side, and an operation had been performed to locate the trouble, but the evidence tends to show that he had recovered from that operation before receiving the injury here complained of. During the time he was suffering from the trouble in his side, in walking about he favored the left leg, and to this defendant's physician attributed the difficulty with his spine now complained of, and which plaintiff's experts characterized as a curvature. The doctors were not agreed upon this question. Defendant's physician described it as a crooked spine brought about by the act of plaintiff in favoring his left leg, as just stated. But we need not pursue the subject. The testimony of the different physicians, those called by both parties, was opinion evidence in the main, and it was for the jury to accept that which satisfied them of the true situation as disclosed by the whole evidence in the case. This was, in substance, what the court said to the jury. And though the court in some respects went beyond what the case required, we conclude that there was no substantial prejudice to the rights of defendant.

4. The other assignments do not require extended mention. There was no unreasonable delay in repudiating the settlement after discovery of the fraud, and the court properly refused to instruct as requested by defendant. If the present condition of plaintiff resulted from the injuries received at the time the train was wrecked, a question of fact, the amount awarded by the jury is within reasonable limits, and not excessive. The evidence upon this, as upon all other issues in the case, presented questions of fact, and we discover no sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict.

Order affirmed.

Contract — action by third person.

1. When one makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third person, such third person can maintain an action upon the promise, even though the consideration does not run directly from him, and even though at the time he knew nothing of the promise to pay him.

For other cases, see Parties, I. a, 2, b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Mortgage — assumption — deficiency.

2. The grantee of mortgaged premises who purchases subject to a mortgage which he assumes and agrees to pay will be held liable for a deficiency arising on a foreclosure and sale, even though his grantor is not personally liable for the payment of the mortgage.

Same — amount in excess of advance.

3. Where A agrees to loan B $2,000, and takes a note and mortgage therefor, and at the time fails to pay B the full sum of $2,000 on account of a shortage of funds, and before he can pay the same the mortgagor sells the property to C, subject to said mortgage, though no agreement to pay or assume the same is given in such deed, and A and B then agree that A shall collect the full sum of $2,000 on the mortgage when it falls due, and shall pay the balance over what he had actually paid to B, and which is $600, when the money is so collected, and gives to B a written obligation binding himself to pay the said sum of $600 and to collect the same, and the land is afterwards sold by C to subsequent grantees, who specifically agree to assume and pay the said mortgage, A may, on foreclosure of the mortgage against the last grantee, collect the full sum of the said mortgage note, namely, $2,000.

A PPEAL by defendant Finseth from a judgment of the District Court for Burleigh County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

Statement by Bruce, J.:

This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage and for a deficiency decree, and comes before us for a trial de novo after judgment being rendered in the trial court in favor of the plaintiff. The question at issue is whether the defendant M. B. Finseth assumed the mortgage, and, even if he did, whether the present plaintiff, Walter A. McDonald, can hold him personally liable for the deficiency decreed against him. The mortgage which the plaintiff seeks to foreclose was executed on January 31, 1910, by one Charles H. Woodbury and wife, and was given to secure a note of the face value of $2,000. It appears, however, that the amount which was actually paid to the Woodburys was only $1,400, the explanation for this transaction being that at the time of the loan McDonald did not have the full $2,000, and paid the Woodburys only $1,400; that shortly thereafter, and on March 4, 1911, and before the payment of the balance, the Woodburys transferred the property to one Ernest Engel, and that it was therefore agreed that McDonald should collect the whole $2,000, and after he had collected the same should pay the $600 to them, the plaintiff testifying that he had executed an obligation which bound him to pay this balance and to collect the amount. This deed from the Woodburys to Ernest Engel was for a recited consideration of $10,525. There was in it no mention of the plaintiff's mortgage, except a covenant that "the premises are free from all encumbrances excepting a mortgage of $2,000 to Walter A. McDonald." There was no specific agreement to pay the mortgage on the part of the grantee, and there were the usual covenants of title and of quiet possession. No parol evidence was introduced on the trial to show any oral or collateral agreement to pay this mortgage, or to show that its payment constituted part of the purchase price. Later, and on March 27, 1911, Engel and his wife executed a deed of the premises for the alleged consideration of $10,500 to C. H. Langley and E. J. Langley. This deed contained the provision that "the premises are free from all encumbrances except a mortgage for $2,000 which second parties (the Langleys) assume and agree to pay with accrued interest from February 1, 1911."

Later, and on June 1, 1911, the Langleys executed a warranty deed of the premises L.R.A.1916D.

for the recited consideration of $10,500 to the defendant and appellant, M. B. Finseth, and to H. A. Hallum. This deed contained in the covenant against encumbrances the following clause: "That the premises are free from all encumbrances except a mortgage for $2,000 which second parties (Finseth and Hallum) agree to pay with accrued interest from February 1, 1911."

It appears that this deed was delivered only to the grantee Hallum, and that appellant, Finseth, did not actually know of the assumption clause contained therein until later, when he found it upon the records of Burleigh county. The trial court found the amount due upon the indebtedness to the plaintiff, McDonald, to be the sum of $2,350, with interest at 10 per cent from January 31, 1913, and the mortgage containing the usual deficiency clause, adjudged and decreed that "in case the property shall not bring a sum sufficient on the sale thereof to pay the entire debt, interest and taxes, that the plaintiff shall have and recover a deficiency judgment against the defendant, M. B. Finseth, if any there be."

From this judgment defendant has appealed, and asks for a trial de novo. His contention is: First, that there was no privity of contract between himself and the mortgagee, McDonald, and therefore no assumption of the mortgage by him; second, that the mortgagee, McDonald, only paid to the Woodburys, the original mortgagors, the sum of $1,400, and that in no case can he be held liable for the difference between the sum of $1,400 and $2,000 which the mortgage ostensibly secured. He argues that his liability can only be founded on the assumption clause in the deed to him from the Langleys; that the covenants of the Woodburys, the original mortgagors and grantors, to Ernest Engel, only stated that the land was free from all encumbrances excepting a mortgage of $2,000 to W. A. McDonald; that this was merely a limitation upon the covenant of title and quiet possession made by the grantor, and in no way constituted an assumption of the mortgage or an agreement to pay the same by the grantee, Engel, and that there is, in the record even, no evidence that the amount of the mortgage was deducted from the purchase price and entered into the consideration for the transfer.

Messrs. S. E. Ellsworth and F. H. Register for appellant.

Mr. M. C. Freerks, for respondent:

The assumption clause inserted in a deed is binding upon the grantee in such deed as an original, independent contract by which the grantee obligates himself to pay the assumed encumbrance as a part of the purchase price of the property conveyed, and such grantee may be proceeded against by a mortgagee or by the grantor.

A grantee who takes a conveyance subject to a mortgage, even as distinguished from an assumption, is presumed to have included the mortgage debt in the purchase price, and is not therefore permitted to dispute the validity of the mortgage. In this respect he is in the same position as one who expressly assumes the mortgage.

And such grantee, so assuming or taking subject to a mortgage, cannot be heard to dispute the amount or validity of the mortgage, nor can he set up duress, illegality of consideration, or coverture of one of the mortgagees.

Bruce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is a decided conflict in the authorities upon the question which is before us, and some courts hold to the rule that the grantee of mortgaged premises who purchases subject to a mortgage which he assumes and agrees to pay will not be liable for a deficiency arising on a foreclosure and sale unless his grantor is also liable legally and equitably for the payment of L.R.A.1916D.

the mortgage, and that if there is a break anywhere in the chain of liability, all of the subsequent purchasers are without obligation in so far as the mortgagee is concerned, and that the promise of the last grantee only operates as an indemnity to his immediate grantor. If we adopt this rule, it is perfectly clear that the trial court erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff and respondent, and that such judgment should be reversed; for, although it is perfectly clear from the record that in the deed from the Langleys to Finseth, Finseth assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage, and that in the deed from Engel to the Langleys, the Langleys also agreed to pay the mortgage, it is not clear that in the deed from the Woodburys to Engel, Engel made any such agreement or assumption; that the chain was therefore broken, and according to the authorities cited there would be no privity of contract between the mortgagee, McDonald, and the defendant M. B. Finseth. We believe, however, that the cases mentioned are unsound in principle, and prefer to follow the other line of authorities which appear to us to express the better rule. The cases cited by counsel for appellant, indeed, seem to totally ignore, in their conclusions, at any rate, even if not in their reasoning, the well-established rule of law that when one makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third person, such third person can maintain an action upon the promise even though the consideration does not run directly from him, and even though at the time he knew nothing of the promise to pay him. Hare v. Murphy, 45 Neb. 809, 29 L.R.A. 851, 64 N. W. 211; McKay v. Ward, 20 Utah, 149, 46 L.R.A. 623, 57 Pac. 1024; Rev. Codes 1895, § 3840; Crone v. Stinde, 156 Mo. 262, 55 S. W. 863, 56 S. W. 907, overruling Hicks v. Hamilton, 144 Mo. 495, 66 Am. St. Rep. 431, 46 S. W. 432. This is certainly the rule which has been announced by this court in construing Rev. Codes 1895, § 3840, which provides that "a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it."

In the case of McArthur v. Dryden, 6 N. D. 438, 71 N. W. 125, we said: "Section 3840, above quoted, contemplates a contract resting upon a present consideration passing between the two contracting parties, and with which the third party has no connection. One of the most common instances of such a contract arises when a mortgagor of real property sells the same, and the grantee, as a part of the consideration, promises and agrees with the mortgagor that he will pay the mortgage debt. Here the conveyance of the property furnishes the consideration for the grantee's promise, and the mortgagee may maintain an action against him. He becomes the principal debtor, and, while the mortgagor is not released, yet, as to the grantee, he stands in the position of a surety. Moore v. Booker, 4 N. D. 543, 62 N. W. 607."

And we are not unaware of the holding in Parlin v. Hall, 2 N. D. 473, 52 N. W. 405, and come to our conclusion in spite of that decision. In our minds, indeed, that case is in no way parallel with the one at bar, as in it the defendant did not agree to pay any debt, or to pay anyone, or to be directly responsible to any third party, but merely "to pay to said first party all the sums which he pays on said guaranty or advances in pursuance of this agreement." This is clearly not a promise to pay any third party. In the case at bar the defendant Finseth expressly agreed in his deed from the Langleys to pay a mortgage of $2,000, and we must assume that this amount was deducted from the purchase price of the land. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 1205; Maher v. Lanfrom, 86 Ill. 513; Freeman v. Auld, 44 N. Y. 50; Hardin v. Hyde, 40 Barb. 435; Fuller v. Hunt, 48 Iowa, 163; Green v. Turner, 38 Iowa, 112; Greither v. Alexander, 15 Iowa, 470; Gage v. Cameron, 212 Ill. 146, 72 N. E. 204; Jehle v. Brooks, 112 Mich. 131, 70 N. W. 440; Strong v. Converse, 8 Allen, 557, 85 Am. Dec. 732; Drury v. Tremont Improv. Co. 13 Allen, 168; Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Emerson, 115 Mass. 554; Schley v. Fryer, 100 N. Y. 71, 2 N. E. 280; Corning v. Bur- ton, 102 Mich. 86, 62 N. W. 1040. The case, indeed, is no different from one in which A, who is anxious to sell his land and also to give his son a present, agrees to sell it to B for $4,000 on the consideration that $3,000 shall be paid to him in cash and the $1,000 balance of the purchase price shall be paid to his son. The last assumption, indeed, is an original promise on the part of the grantee, Finseth, to pay the plaintiff, McDonald, a certain sum of money, and, under what we believe to be the better line of authorities, can be and is properly supported by the consideration afforded by the transfer of land to him and by the fact that the amount of the mortgage was deducted from the purchase price, and this even though there was no direct dealing between him and the plaintiff mortgagee. Crone v. Stinde, 156 Mo. 262, 55 S. W. 863, 56 S. W. 907 (overruling Hicks v. Hamilton, 144 Mo. 495, 66 Am. St. Rep. 431, 46 S. W. 432; Harberg v. Arnold, 78 Mo. App. 237; and Heim v. Vogel, 69 Mo. 529); Birke v. Abbott, 103 Ind. 1, 53 Am. Rep. 474, 1 N. E. 485; Hare v. Murphy, 45 Neb. 809, 29 L.R.A. 851, 64 N. W. 211; Little v. Thoman, 4 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 513; McKay v. Ward, 20 Utah, 149, 46 L.R.A. 623, 57 Pac. 1024; Cobb v. Fishel, 15 Colo. App. 384, 62 Pac. 625; Marble Sav. Bank v. Mesarvey, 101 Iowa, 285, 70 N. W. 198; Merriman v. Moore, 90 Pa. 78; Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. 337; Enos v. Sanger, 96 Wis. 150, 37 L.R.A. 862, 65 Am. St. Rep. 38, 70 N. W. 1069; Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 467; Bay v. Williams, 112 Ill. 91, 54 Am. Rep. 209, 1 N. E. 340.

So, too, it is immaterial whether the original mortgagor in fact received from the plaintiff the full sum of $2,000 or not, or whether, as claimed by the defendant, $600 of the $2,000 has never been paid to the original mortgagor. The evidence shows that this $600 was not paid, but was kept back for a short time with the consent of both parties on account of the immediate lack of funds of the mortgagee, and that in the interim the original mortgagors, the Woodburys, deeded the property to Ernest Engel, such deed containing the provision that the premises were "free from all encumbrances except a mortgage of $2,000 to Walter A. McDonald." It is true that under the holding of this court in the cases of Smith v. Gaub, 19 N. D. 337, 123 N. W. 827, and Sommers v. Wagner, 21 N. D. 531, 131 N. W. 797, Ernest Engel, the grantee of the Woodburys, was not himself bound to pay the mortgage debt, and that "an express exception, contained only in the covenant against encumbrances in a deed to real property, of a mortgage upon the land, in the absence of qualifying words making the granting of the deed subject to such encumbrance, and making the restriction upon the covenant against encumbrances apply also to the covenant of warranty and generally to all the covenants in the deed, does not except such mortgage from the covenant of warranty."

The deed from the Woodburys to Engel, indeed, contained the provision that the "parties of the first part (the Woodburys) for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, do covenant with the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, that they are well seised of the land and premises aforesaid and have good right to sell and convey the same in the manner and form aforesaid; that the same are free from all encumbrances except a mortgage of $2,000 to Walter A. McDonald, and the above bargained and granted land and premises in the quiet and peaceable possession of said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, against all persons lawfully claiming or to claim the whole or any part thereof, the said parties of the first part will warrant and defend."

It is also true that, though it might have been shown by parol evidence that the amount of the $2,000 mortgage was deducted from the purchase price, there is no such proof in the record.

The fact remains, however, that the last grantee, the defendant Finseth, specifically agreed to pay the $2,000 mortgage, and the question before us is merely whether the plaintiff, McDonald, can, in a court of equity, take advantage of the promise and assert his claim. It is perfectly clear that he could have asserted it against the original mortgagors, the Woodburys, for the testimony shows that McDonald had agreed with these parties to collect the full amount of the mortgage note, and had given back to them an obligation by which he had agreed to pay them this amount of money when so collected. His testimony is as follows: "I do not believe I ever met the defendant Finseth—may have seen him. The full amount, $2,000, was not paid by me, only $1,400, plus interest and an acknowledgment for $600. Instead of giving these people $600 in cash, to save making up a new set of papers, I gave them an acknowledgment that when the note would be paid I would give them $600, and that acknowledgment has never been taken up. I was not to pay it until this note of $2,000 was paid. That was the understanding on this $600, which they have never received as a part of the $2,000, and has been drawing interest. If the note is not paid by the makers I would say that the only consideration that secures this mortgage is $1,400. I gave them $1,400. I never gave them any other money. I have not paid anything on the $600 acknowledgment. I was not planning on paying it until the note here in question of $2,000 was paid. All that I am out at the present time is $1,400 and interest and some costs. I have collected the interest on the $2,000 note up to January 31, 1913, I think. My agreement to pay the $600 has never been surrendered and is still an outstanding obligation against me. I have collected $600 interest up to January 31, 1913—10 per cent."

Even though the deed from the Woodburys to Engel would preclude the idea that Engel agreed to assume and pay the mortgage debt, still the fact remains that the sum would be a lien upon the premises and the title of the grantee would be subject thereto, and the presumption would be, even without proof, that that amount of money was deducted from the purchase price. Although, indeed, to quote the language in the opinion of Smith v. Gaub, supra, and in relation to the modification of the covenant of warranty by the statement that the premises were free from all encumbrances except the mortgage specified, "if plaintiff had wished or intended to except the mortgage from the covenant of warranty, he could easily have done so by making the restriction upon the covenant against encumbrances apply to all the covenants of the deed. In view of the case with which it may be accomplished, it is inconceivable that a careful conveyancer in a document so formal and important as a deed should fail to make the exception in some such manner."

This court must nevertheless take judicial notice of the well-established customs of business and trade, and it will not be presumed, in the absence of proof, that any person would take a deed to land which was subject to a mortgage without deducting such amount from the purchase price, nor that he would rely entirely on the covenants of warranty of his grantor to protect his purchase. The fact, indeed, that the interest on the full $2,000 was paid up to the 31st day of January, 1913, and partly by the defendant himself, adds emphasis to this presumption. Whether or not the plaintiff had paid to his original mortgagor the full amount of the mortgage note, indeed, is a matter which lies between such original mortgagor and the plaintiff. So far as the defendant in this action is concerned, and his immediate grantor, none of such parties can be held to have paid their debts or complied with the provisions of their agreements of purchase until they have paid the $2,000; and since in their deeds they expressly agreed to assume and pay the mortgage, under all of the authorities the presumption would be that the full amount was deducted from the purchase price, and that the same was retained by them for the very purpose of paying the same. They had, in short, agreed to pay this debt to the grantors in a certain manner, and this included the paying of $2,000 and interest to the owner of the mortgage, and we can see no reason why these contracts were not valid and could not be enforced.

Nor is there any merit in the contention that the deed was not delivered to the defendant Finseth, but to his cotenant, H. A. Hallum, and that said cotenant had no authority to obligate the defendant Finseth to pay such mortgage or to accept a deed containing such clause. This point was mentioned in the oral argument, but is not suggested in the brief. If it had been, the answer to it is that the defendant Finseth himself testified that he knew the property had been deeded to himself and his cotenant; that he knew there was a mortgage on the property and paid interest on it; that his cotenant told him that he had received the deed; that he knew that he had placed it of record—that he told him he had; that the property now stands in his name; that he paid half of the interest for two years on the full $2,000, and that Mr. Hallum paid the other half; and that he understood it was to be sent up to Mr. McDonald. The deed was recorded on the 7th day of August, 1911. This action was not begun until June, 1914. It would hardly seem that the grantee of a recorded deed can sit quietly for three years, remain in possession of the premises, and pay the interest on a mortgage which is assumed thereon, and then claim that he did not know of or consent to the terms of the instrument.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

I concur in the affirmance, but express no opinion upon paragraphs 3 and 4 of the opinion.

Annotation—Right of mortgagee to enforce purchaser's promise to pay the mortgage where the grantor, or promisee, was not himself liable.

This subject has been treated in the notes to Kramer v. Gardner, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 492, and Fry v. Ausman, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 150. A further search has disclosed only two additional cases directly in point.

Casselman v. Gordon (1916) — Va. —, 88 S. E. 58, holds, like McDonald v. Finseth, ante, 149, that a grantee of mortgaged premises who assumes and agrees to pay the mortgage is liable to the mortgagee, although the former's immediate grantor is not personally liable for the payment of the mortgage, upon the principle, embodied in a statute, that a promise made by one person to another for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by the latter.

It is held in Llewellyn v. Butler

(1915) 186 Mo. App. 525, 172 S. W. 413, that, in Missouri, at least, the benefit of the grantee's promise to pay the mortgage inures to the benefit of the mortgagee without regard to the liability of the grantee's predecessor in title.

In Baber v. Hanie (1913) 163 N. O. 588, L.R.A.—, 80 S. E. 57, where it was held that a mortgagee could recover, under the doctrine of subrogation, a deficiency judgment against a grantee, where all of the successive grantees of the land mortgaged had assumed the mortgage debt, the court stated that a recovery could not be had, under such doctrine, against the grantee of a mortgagor who was not personally liable for the payment of the mortgage.

Parkhurst, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause comes before this court on respondent's appeal from a decree entered by Mr. Justice Tanner in the superior court on the 11th day of May, 1915, under the provisions of the workmen's compensation act, so called, enacted by Public Laws of 1912, chapter 831. In this decree it is recited that on the 1st day of December, 1914, the petitioner, William Carroll, was engaged at Providence, Rhode Island, in the employ of the respondent, What Cheer Stables Company, and had been engaged in this employment for the space of about five years; that said Carroll was not engaged in domestic service or agriculture at the time, but was in the employ of the respondent as a hack driver, and on the 1st day of December, 1914, while engaged in this employ, received a personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of said employment; that at said time the company had elected to become subject to the act, and the employee had waived his right of action at common law; that the injury was not occasioned by the wilful intention of the employee to bring about the injury to himself, and did not result from his intoxication while on duty; that the cause of the injury was falling from the driver's seat of a hack which the petitioner was driving in the regular course of his employment, the fall probably being due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by a disease from which he was suffering, the evidence showing hernia, hardening of the arteries, and Bright's disease; that the injuries were a broken right clavicle, broken ribs, and shock to the nervous system, rendering the employee totally and permanently incapacitated for work, and resulted in the permanent total incapacity of said Carroll; that at the time of said injury the employee was receiving wages in the sum of $13 per week, working seven days a week with one day off in each four weeks; that the amount of average weekly wages at the time of receiving the injury was $10.73, and that the sum of $28 is a reasonable charge for medical and hospital services and medicines required by the employee during the first two weeks after the injury; and that upon the above facts the What Cheer Stables Company should pay said Carroll the sum of $28 for medical services and medicines as aforesaid, and the further sum of $5.36 per week compensation computed from the 1st day of December, 1914, until further order of the court, but in no event for a period in excess of 500 weeks. Costs were awarded in the sum of $12.

be found at pages 33 et seq., and the American cases at pages 227 et seq., of the annotation in L.R.A.1916A, 23, on "Workmen's Compensation Acts." See also, in this connection, annotation in L.R.A.1916A, 303, on hernia as an "accident" or "personal injury" within the meaning of the compensation acts.

On the 13th day of May, 1915, the company filed with the clerk of the superior court a "claim of appeal from the final decree of the said superior court entered on the 11th day of May, A. D. 1915." On the 27th day of May said company filed with the clerk aforesaid its reasons of appeal which are in substance, and without stating them in full, that the decision of the justice and the decree appealed are against the law and the evidence, in various details.

The real question raised by this appeal arises from the contention of the respondent that the evidence does not show a "personal injury sustained by accident by an employee arising out of and in the course of his employment," under the language of the statute (Pub. Laws 1912, chap. 831, art. I), § 1 of which reads as follows: "Section 1. In an action to recover damages for personal injury sustained by accident by an employee arising out of and in the course of his employment, or for death resulting from personal injury so sustained, it shall not be a defense: (a) That the employee was negligent; (b) that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow employee; (c) that the employee has assumed the risk of the injury."

The respondent's brief proceeds to state its contention as follows: "This is the section of the act which defines those industrial accidents which the legislature had under consideration and against which it sought to protect the employee. Hence, to entitle the workman to compensation, the following elements must appear: (1) That the workman suffered an injury; (2) that he suffered an injury by 'accident'; (3) that the injury and the accident arose 'out of' the employment; and (4) that the injury and the accident arose in the course of the employment. By this language the legislature intended not simply that the 'injury,' but that both the 'injury' and the 'accident,' must arise out of and in the course of the employment. In the great majority of cases it would be impossible to separate the injury and the accident, so that one might arise out of the employment while the other would not. In the case before us, while we may admit for the sake of argument that the particular injury—the broken collar bone and ribs—were caused by the fall, and that the fall arose out of and in the course of the employment because the petitioner at that moment happened to be sitting on the seat of his cab, it by no means follows that the 'accident' arose 'out of' the employment. This, we believe, is where the authorities, which will no doubt appear on the petitioner's brief, have gone astray. That the 'accident' occurred 'in the course of' the employment is admitted. . .

The respondent takes the position (1) that there is no evidence to support the finding of the presiding justice that either the injury or the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, and (2) that such finding was against the law, since the legislature never intended that act to apply to accidents caused solely by a workman's previously diseased condition."

The only respect in which this decree is challenged by the appellant is as to the finding of fact that the petitioner "received a personal injury by accident arising out of . . . said employment;" and the appellant contends that the accident was solely due to the previously diseased condition of the petitioner, and not at all to the employment.

It must be obvious that the petitioner, as the driver of a hack, seated at a height of 4 or 5 feet from the ground, upon a moving vehicle, is exposed to some risk of accident which would not be incident to an occupation carried on by a person seated upon the ground or upon a stationary platform. And this would be more so in case of an employee subject to attacks of vertigo or dizziness, or of temporary unconsciousness. Now, although there is some evidence that the petitioner admitted that he had an attack of dizziness or unconsciousness just before he fell, and that caused him to fall, it is to be noted that there is no evidence that he had ever before had such an attack when he was driving; his only previous disability, so far as the evidence shows, had been a slight temporary disability due to displacement of his truss, when at work harnessing his horses, and which required him to lie down for a few minutes to readjust his truss; and he was also unable, on account of his rupture, to lift trunks on or off his hack. There is no evidence that he had at any time before the accident had any disability with regard to driving his horses when he was seated upon the carriage. But there is direct and positive evidence from a witness who saw him fall, who said, "I thought . . . that the horses ran against the curbstone and he fell off headfirst;" that "the horses was coming down the side of the sidewalk, not running, but not coming easy, on a kind of a gallop, and the first thing I see he was pitched out headfirst on the side, that way" (illustrating); that "he was pitched up on the side, half on the sidewalk and half on the hill."

This evidence shows that the petitioner's fall was more than the mere inert fall or collapse of an unconscious man (see Lewis v. Globe Indemnity Co. Mass. W. C. C. 1912-1913, p. 48; Sanderson v. Globe Indemnity Co. Mass. W. C. C. pp. 224, 229); that it was a positive throwing or pitching of the driver from his seat by the movement of the hack turning or lurching into the gutter, toward or against the curbstone, and might have happened to a driver in full possession of his senses; and although the justice of the superior court in his rescript does not allude to this evidence, it is to be presumed that, when he came to enter his final decree and decreed that petitioner "received a personal injury by accident arising out of . . . said employment," he made his finding upon all the evidence before him. We think that the evidence above quoted, therefore, was such as to warrant the finding of fact which is here challenged, and that under the decision in Jillson v. Ross, 38 R. I. 145, 94 Atl. 717 (July 2, 1915), we should not be justified in setting aside the decree upon this ground, since the act provides that findings of fact, in the absence of fraud, shall be conclusive.

The evidence does not show, as claimed by the appellant, that the petitioner's fall was "caused solely by the workman's previously diseased condition," nor does the justice of the superior court so decide; the justice says in his decree, "the fall probably being due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by a disease from which he was suffering," etc. But the decree also finds that the accident was one "arising out of . . . said employment;" there is at least as much evidence that the fall was due to an unexpected and accidental lurch of the hack into the gutter and towards or against the curbstone, as that it was due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by disease. It seems to this court that the decision and the decree appealed from embody a conclusive finding of fact that dizziness or unconsciousness was not the sole cause of the fall, and that there was evidence from which the justice could find as he did that the accident arose out of the employment.

Several cases have been cited on behalf of the petitioner where it appeared that the claimant had, prior to the accident, been suffering from disease, and where it appeared that the diseased condition predisposed the claimant to the accident which occurred, and where it has nevertheless been held that the claimant was entitled to recover. In a very well-considered case in the English court of appeal, decided in 1905, under the English workmen's compensation act (Wicks v. Dowell & Co. [1905] 2 K. B. 225, 2 Ann. Cas. 732), it appears that a workman employed in unloading coal from a ship, who was required in the course of his duty to stand by the open hatchway through which the coal was being brought up from the hold, was seized with an epileptic fit while at work, and fell into the hold and was seriously injured; it was held that regard must be had to the proximate cause of the accident resulting in the injury, which was to be found in the necessary proximity of the workman to the hatchway; that the accident therefore arose "out of" as well as "in the course of" his employment, and that he was entitled to compensation under the act. It appeared that the employee was subject to epileptic fits; that it was his duty to stand on a wooden stage close to the edge of the hatchway, the stage being so constructed as to enable him to look down into the hold, and while standing on the stage he had to regulate the descent of the bucket into, and its ascent out of, the hold by means of a long pole, and also to give the necessary signals to the man who was working the crane; while thus engaged he was seized with an epileptic fit and fell through the hatchway into the hold and sustained very serious injuries. He had had an epileptic fit on three previous occasions. The county court judge held that the accident was due to the fit, and did not arise out of the employment within the meaning of the act, and refused to award compensation. The applicant appealed. In the court of appeal it was contended, as here, that, "as the original cause of the applicant's fall was the fit with which he was seized, the cause was one which the man himself carried about with him, and that the damage which he sustained did not arise out of and in the course of his employment, but arose out of the idiopathic condition of the workman at the time."

The court fully discusses and disposes of this contention upon principle and authority, and determines that the thing which happened was an "accident" within the meaning of the act. The court, after discussing the rules and principles laid down in accident insurance cases, speaking through Collins, M. R., says (page 229):

"But those authorities are, in my judgment, directly in point. A man is picked up at the bottom of the hold of a ship suffering from injuries; what is the cause of his condition? The proximate cause obviously is that he has fallen from a height. But it is suggested that if the occurrence is analyzed, it will be seen that the accident was caused by the idiopathic disease from which the man was suffering, and that therefore the accident did not arise out of his employment. At that point the authorities come in, to the effect that, although the cause of the fall was a fit, the cause of the injuries was the fall itself, and they are direct authorities that the injury in the present case was caused by an accident.

"Then did the accident arise out of the man's employment? When we get rid of the confusion caused by the fact that the fall was originally caused by the fit, and the confusion involved in not dissociating the injury and its actual physical cause from the more remote cause, that is to say, from the fit, the difficulty arising from the words 'out of the employment' is removed. How does it come about in the present case that the accident arose out of the employment? Because by the conditions of his employment the workman was bound to stand on the edge of what I may style a precipice, and if in that position he was seized with a fit, he would almost necessarily fall over. If that is so, the accident was caused by his necessary proximity to the precipice, for the fall was brought about by the necessity for his standing in that position. Upon the authorities I think the case is clear; an accident does not cease to be such because its remote cause was the idiopathic condition of the injured man; we must dissociate that idiopathic condition from the other facts and remember that he was obliged to run the risk by the very nature of his employment, and that the dangerous fall was brought about by the conditions of that employment. I think, therefore, that the present case comes within the purview of the workmen's compensation act, and that there is nothing in either the decision or the dicta of the learned Lords in Fenton v. J. Thorley & Co. [1903] A. C. 443, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 787, 52 Week. Rep. 81, 89 L. T. N. S. 314, 19 Times L. R. 684, which in any way qualifies the view that I have endeavored to express. The appeal must be allowed.

"Mathew, L. J.: I am of the same opinion. The case affords an illustration of the rule that one should look to the immediate, L.R.A.1916D.

and not to the remote, cause. In this case the immediate cause of the injury was the fall. I see no reason why we should hold that there was not an accident within the meaning of this statute. The true mode of dealing with the case is shown by a reference to the insurance cases that were cited during the argument. In Fenton v. J. Thorley & Co. Lord Macnaghten said: 'One other remark I should like to make. It does seem to me extraordinary that anybody should suppose that when the advantage of insurance against accident at their employers' expense was being conferred on workmen, Parliament could have intended to exclude from the benefit of the act some injuries ordinarily described as "accidents" which, beyond all others, merit favorable consideration in the interest of workmen and employers alike.' If we apply that view to the particular case, and treat the claim as an action brought upon a policy of insurance against accidents arising out of the employment of the assured, there can be no question that such a policy would cover the case. In my opinion we ought not to go back along the train of circumstances and trace the accident to some remote source when it is plain that the man was in fact injured by falling from the place where he was standing, and where it was his duty to stand, in discharge of his duty to his employer.

"Cozens-Hardy, L. J.: I agree, and have little to add. It seems plain to me on the authorities that what happened here was an 'accident.' It is also plain, and indeed is not contested, that the accident happened in the course of the employment; the only difficulty is whether it arose 'out of' the employment; on the whole, I am of opinion that it did. If I could adopt the view that has been pressed upon us, that the employer is not liable for the remote consequences of a disability which the workman brings with him to his work, I should come to a different conclusion; but I think the truer view is that a man always brings some disability with him; it may be a disability arising from age; it may be of some other nature. A workman who is put in a dangerous position in order to do his work is more liable to an accident by reason of the disability which he brings with him than he would otherwise be. Again, an old man is inherently more likely to meet with an accident than a young one, but an employer could not excuse himself on the ground of the man's age. The same consideration applies to a tendency to illness or to a fit; and if a man with such a tendency is told to go to work in a dangerous position and there meets with an accident, the accident none the less arises out of his employment because its remote cause is to be found in his own physical condition.

"Appeal allowed."

The case of Wicks v. Dowell & Co. supra, was followed in the case of Driscoll v. Cushman's Exp. Co. Mass. W. C. C. (July 1, 1912—June 30, 1913) pp. 125, 130, where the driver of an express wagon, employed by the defendant, while driving his wagon, suffered a fainting fit, or an epileptiform attack," falling from his wagon and fracturing his skull, dying from the effect of the fracture. It was held by the Industrial Accident Board, in review and in confirmation of the decision of the committee of arbitration, that the employee was exposed to a substantial and increased risk owing to his occupation, that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, and that the dependent mother was entitled to compensation.

Wicks v. Dowell & Co. supra, was cited by the court with apparent approval in Fennah v. Midland & G. W. R. Co. 45 Ir. Law Times, 192, 4 B. W. C. C. 440, 442, a case decided in the court of appeal, Ireland, 1911, and has been frequently cited in argument both in the English court of appeal and in the House of Lords. No case has been cited to us in which that case has been criticized, modified, doubted, or overruled. A number of cases have been cited to us involving the same general principle that where the previous diseased condition or temporary illness of the employee is a contributing or antecedent cause of the accident, nevertheless the employee may recover. See: The Swansea Vale v. Rice, [1912] A. C. 238, 4 B. W. C. C. 298, 27 Times L. R. 440, 55 Sol. Jo. 497, 48 Scot. L. R. 1095, 104 L. T. N. S. 658, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 872, 12 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 242, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 839, a case of temporary illness, contributing to the accident of falling overboard from a vessel. Fennah v. Midland & G. W. R. Co. supra, where an engine driver, at work on his engine while stopped at a station, tightening up a nut, fell to the permanent way and died from the effects of the fall, and where it appeared that he had previously had fainting fits, it was held that recovery could be had; that it was an accident arising out of his employment. Ismay v. Williamson, 1 B. W. C. C. 232, 42 Ir. S. 340 (House of Lords), a case of death of a workman who had a very serious aneurism of the aorta, which ruptured while he was engaged in his ordinary occupation; disease of long standing. M'Innes v. Dunsmuir & Jackson, 45 Scot. L. R. 804, 1 B. W. C. Lancashire Shipping Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 290, 7 B. W. C. C. 428 (court of appeal, England), a case of death from heat stroke suffered by a laborer in the engine room of a steamer in the Red sea, deceased being physically unfit for the work, which involved exposure to extreme heat, citing Ismay v. Williamson, supra. See also Morgan v. The Zenaida, 25 Times L. R. 446, 2 B. W. C. C. 19, and Aitken v. Finlayson, B. & Co. [1914] S. C. 770, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 398.

We are of the opinion that the decree appealed from in this case is fully supported by the evidence; and, under the principles of law so clearly set forth in the above-cited cases, with which we find no reason to dissent, we find that what happened to the petitioner was an "accident" under the terms of the act, and that the accident "arose out of . . . the employment."

The appellant cites a few cases which do not seem to this court to have any weight in this connection, since the court in each case found that injury or death of the employee did not "arise out of the employment," but arose from natural causes to which anyone not so employed would have been equally subject. Sheldon v. Needham [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 274, 7 B. W. C. C. 471, 30 Times L. R. 590, 58 Sol. Jo. 652, Rodger v. Paisley School Board [1912] W. C. Rep. 157, [1912] S. C. 584, 5 B. W. C. C. 547, 49 Scot. L. In the latter case the accident and death were found to have arisen out of intoxication, and not out of the employment. We have carefully examined all of these latter cases and find nothing therein to disturb our conclusions.

Our decision is that the decree appealed from be affirmed; that the appeal be dismissed, and the cause remanded to the Superior Court for further proceedings.

Vincent, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree with the majority of the court in affirming the decree of the superior court and dismissing the respondent's appeal.

The petitioner, at the time of the accident, was in the employ of the respondent company as driver of a vehicle commonly known as a hack or hackney carriage, such employment requiring him to occupy the elevated seat common thereto. On the day of the accident, while the petitioner was driving along one of the public streets, he became wholly or partially unconscious, or was seized with dizziness or vertigo, whereupon he fell from his seat to the ground, sustaining some injuries. It is not disputed that the petitioner had, for a considerable period prior to the time of his accident, been in a condition of health which might at any moment cause him to become unconscious or dizzy to an extent which would deprive him, temporarily, at least, of physical control.

The majority opinion proceeds upon the theory that there was some testimony, produced in the court below, showing that the fall of the petitioner, from his seat on the hack, was occasioned by a sudden contact of the wheel with the curbstone. The testimony referred to is that of Mrs. McKenna, who, at the time of the accident, was sitting at her window and viewed the scene across two streets. On examining the testimony, bearing in mind that the burden of proof is upon the petitioner to show that the accident arose out of the employment, I find that it amounts to nothing. She says in her direct examination: "I thought he stumbled against the curbstone; that the horses ran against the curbstone and he fell off head-first."

This in itself is not testimony tending to prove that the wheel of the hack came in contact with the curbstone. It is simply the way in which the witness, viewing the situation from a distance, imagined that the fall must have been occasioned. Later, in cross-examination, any doubt about her testimony is disposed of when she says, in answer to the question: "You didn't see anything happen to the hack or to the horses or anything except Mr. Carroll pitch off from the hack, did you?" "That is all, that is all I noticed then."

This testimony not only fails to sustain the burden of proof before mentioned, but it is not testimony from which it can be reasonably assumed or inferred that the wheel of the hack came in contact with the curbstone at all. Mrs. McKenna did not see the wheel strike the curbstone, and she does not claim to have seen anything of the kind. The petitioner does not claim that his wheel struck the curbstone or went into the gutter; in fact, he says he does not remember any jumping of the horses or hitting any stone or ditch. Upon this state of the testimony how can it be assumed that the proximate cause of the accident was the contact of the wheel with the curbing of the street? It is also evident that the superior court did not consider this evidence sufficient when it said: "That the cause of such injury was falling from the driver's seat of the hack which the petitioner was driving in the regular course of his employment, the fall probably being due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by a disease from which he was suffering. . . ."

Further that this the petitioner told Mr. Stockard, in speaking of the accident, that he felt a dizzy spell coming on. That he made such a statement to Mr. Stockard the petitioner nowhere denies, but in his direct testimony he says that he lost consciousness when he fell.

There is some testimony on the part of the petitioner that in his descent from the hack he came in contact with some portion of the outfit, presumably the whiffletree or crossbar, from which it might be argued that his realization of such an occurrence tended to show that he was not wholly unconscious at the time of the accident. It is not, however, important to ascertain the exact degree of mental power or physical control which the petitioner possessed at the time of and immediately preceding his fall. Whether he was partially or wholly unconscious or simply dizzy, without being unconscious at all is not important in this consideration. It cannot be seriously or reasonably claimed that his fall was occasioned otherwise than by a sudden seizure of some kind, induced by his physical condition. The court below, in its findings of fact, reached that conclusion. Furthermore, it is not claimed that the physical condition of the petitioner was brought about or affected by his employment, or that his employment in any way operated, in connection with his diseased condition, to bring about or produce the particular attack which caused this fall.

The statute regulating the compensation of workmen provides that such compensation is only payable in cases where the injuries sustained arise out of and in the course of the employment; and it is generally conceded by the authorities that the burden is upon the petitioner to show that his injuries arose both out of and in the course of his employment. There is no question in the present case but what the accident occurred in the course of the employment, but did it arise out of the employment? It is quite clear to my mind that it did not. It seems to me to be desirable, not to say necessary, to determine, first, what is the proximate cause of the accident; and, second, whether or not there is any relation between such proximate cause and the employment in which the petitioner was engaged.

In the old case of Scott v. Shepherd, decided in 1770, and reported in 2 W. Bl. 892, 3 Wils. 403, which is more popularly known as the "Squib" Case, it was held that trespass and assault will lie for originally throwing a lighted squib, which, after having been thrown about in self-defense by other persons, at last put out the plaintiff's eye. The question there was whether the action could be maintained against the person who first threw the squib, and it was held that such action could be maintained. In a recent law publication called the "Docket," under date of December, 1915, I find the following comment upon the Squib Case: "Many, many cases have been bottomed on the Squib Case, that unhappy accident seeming to have an illustrative value beyond any other instance of causal connection ever brought to the attention of court or counsel. The most recent, of note, is Salmi v. Columbia & N. River R. Co. 75 Or. 200, L.R.A. 1915D, 834, 146 Pac. 819, and comes from Oregon, where the complainant, a woman, lived near a railroad right of way on which the railroad company exploded a 'large and unsafe blast,' so greatly frightening complainant that she swooned, and swooning fell, and falling injured herself, sustaining a rupture. In refuting the contention that she could not recover for injuries from fright alone, Burnett, J., in an able opinion, after referring to the analogy to the noted Squib Case, says: 'Likewise in this instance the explosion of the blast naturally produced the mental state of fright, the fright the faint, the faint the fall, the fall the fracture of the abdominal wall, upon which the plaintiff rests her cause of action.'"

The law as laid down in the Squib Case has continued to be the law in England and this country down to the present time, and it determines that a defendant who exerted the original force is responsible for the injury, such force having been transmitted to the plaintiff through a series of acts which were the direct consequence of the original act. In other words, the original act was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff.

In a case of this character the proximate cause is always that cause which, acting through a natural sequence of events, causes the injury. The cases furnish a multitude of definitions of proximate cause which, while they are couched in different language, are substantially the same in substance; as, for example: "The proximate cause is the dominant cause, not the one which is incidental to that cause, its mere instrument, though L.R.A.1916D.

the latter may be nearest in place and time to the loss."

Again: "The proximate cause is the dominant controlling one, and not those which are mere incidents."

And further: "The proximate cause of an accident is a cause without which the accident would not have occurred."

See 6 Words & Phrases, 5762, and cases cited.

Applying this principle to the case in hand the conclusion is inevitable that the unconsciousness or dizziness of the petitioner was the proximate cause of his accident. It was the one thing without which the accident would not have happened; it was the dominant cause, and the subsequent fall and contact with the ground were simply incidents or events which naturally and necessarily followed. This being so, it cannot be reasonably argued under the evidence in this case, that, as between the employment and cause of the accident, there was any relation whatsoever; and therefore it cannot be said that the injuries of the petitioner arose out of his employment.

The majority opinion in support of its conclusions cites ten cases. Two of the cases cited cannot be distinguished from the case before us, namely, Wicks v. Dowell & Co. [1905] 2 K. B. 225, 74 L. J. K. B. N. S. 572, 53 Week. Rep. 515, 92 L. T. N. S. 677, 21 Times L. R. 487, 2 Ann. Cas. 732, and Driscoll v. Cushman, Mass. W. C. C. June 30, 1913, pp. 125, 130. The remaining eight cases cited are easily and readily distinguishable.

The case of Fennah v. Midland & G. W. R. Co. 4 B. W. C. C. 440, 45 Ir. Law Times, 192, was that of an engine driver who was tightening up a nut upon his engine while his train was at the station. He was later found lying between the engine and platform, and died in a few minutes. There was evidence showing that on three previous occasions when the train was at a station the deceased had fainted, but a few days prior to the time of his decease he was examined by a physician of the company and found physically fit. This case is materially different from the case at bar, there being no testimony whatever that he suffered a fainting fit at the time of his death, or that the proximate cause of the accident was anything else than the fall.

The case of Ismay v. Williamson, 1 B. W. C. C. 232, 42 Ir. Law Times, 213, was a case in which a seaman employed as a trimmer on board ship, whilst engaged in drawing ashes from the bottom of the ship's furnace, had a heat stroke from which he died. In M'Inness v. Dunsmuir & Jackson, 45 Scot. L. R. 804, 1 B. W. C. C. 226, a workman, in the course of his ordinary and usual employment, overexerted himself and brought on an attack of cerebral hemorrhage. In Clover, C. & Co. v. Hughes [1910] A. C. 242, 3 B. W. C. C. 275, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 470, 26 Times L. R. 359, [1910] W. N. 73, 102 L. T. N. S. 340, a workman suffering from aneurism of the aorta was doing his work in the ordinary way by tightening a nut with a spanner. This ordinary strain caused a rupture of the aneurism, resulting in death. In Maskery v. Lancashire Shipping Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 290, 7 B. W. C. C. 428, an engineer, while working in the engine room of a steamer in the Red sea, sustained a heat stroke from the effects of which he died. In Aitken v. Finlayson, B. & Co. [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 398, [1914] S. C. 770, a workman running to the scene of an accident, and thence to telephone for a doctor, by his exertion brought on a fit of apoplexy.

It will readily be observed that in each of the last six cases the death or injury was brought about by influences directly proceeding from the employment; as, for instance, where a man suffered a stroke from the heat of a furnace about which and in connection with which he was employed. All these last-mentioned cases are decidedly different from the case at bar, where there is no proof whatsoever that the impaired physical condition of the petitioner was due to or was even aroused by his employment.

In the case of The Swansea Vale v. Rice, [1912] A. C. 238, 4 B. W. C. C. 298, 27 Times L. R. 440, 104 L. T. N. S. 658, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 672, 12 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 47, 55 Sol. Jo. 497, [1912] W. C. Rep. 242, the chief officer of a steam vessel fell overboard during his duty on deck. Some two or three hours prior to the accident, he had gone below, complaining of headache and giddiness, had taken a dose of castor oil and returned to his duty on deck. There was, however, no testimony nor any other circumstances from which it might be inferred that the officer was suffering from giddiness at the time of the accident, and that case is therefore materially unlike the one which I am considering here.

The case of Driscoll v. Cushman & Co., Mass. W. C. C. June 30, 1913, pp. 125, 130, which follows to some extent the case of Wicks v. Dowell & Co. supra, also differs from it in some respects. The Board of Arbitration there held that the employed was exposed to a substantially increased risk owing to the position in which he had to work,—meaning that, as a driver of an express wagon, he occupied a more elevated position than he would have occupied in some other employment.

It is evident that the more elevated the position of the workman, the more likely he is to be injured in case he falls, but that does not affect the principle. The same principle should govern whether the person suffering the accident stands in one place or another so far as the determination of the proximate cause of the accident is concerned. The degree to which he may be injured in one place, as compared with the possible extent of his injuries in another, does not in any way assist in the determination as to what was the proximate cause of the accident, or whether the accident arose out of the employment. All that arises out of the employment is that the consequences of the fall are more serious, but the fall itself does not arise out of it. It is wrong to disassociate the petitioner's dizziness or unconsciousness, and to say that though the one was not an accident, the other was.

This leads to the discussion of the case of Wicks v. Dowell & Co. supra, which, as before stated, cannot be distinguished from the case at bar. In that case a workman, employed in unloading coal from a ship, was standing in the course of his duty by an open hatchway through which the coal was being drawn up from the hold. He was seized with an epileptic fit and fell into the hold and was seriously injured. The court held that the proximate cause of the accident was to be found in the close proximity of the workman to the hatchway, and that the accident therefore arose out of his employment. As we have seen from the authorities cited, the proximate cause is that cause without which the accident would not have happened. The proximate cause is that cause which, through a natural sequence of events, results in the injury. There was no claim in that case that the epileptic attack was brought about or induced by the employment. But it was nevertheless the proximate cause of the accident because without it the accident would not have happened. It was the one thing operating through a natural sequence of events that led to the injury. Between such proximate cause and the employment there was absolutely no relation whatsoever, and it seems to me that to follow that case is to adopt and perpetuate a patent absurdity.

The case of Wicks v. Dowell & Co. supra, decided in 1905, has not always been followed by later decisions of the English courts. Thus, in the case of Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union, 5 B. W. C. C. 355, and [1912] W. C. Rep. 222, decided by the court of appeals in 1912, it appeared a workhouse master, while on duty in the evening, was sitting smoking at the top of a flight of steps. He was suffering from tuberculosis, and while seized by a fit of coughing became dizzy and fell down the steps, from which fall he sustained injuries. The court said:

"It has been decided that an accident 'arising out of' means some risk reasonably incidental to the employment; that the man is more exposed to the particular risk than other persons of the community. . . . There is nothing peculiar in the employment which renders the risk greater than that to which ordinary persons are exposed." "The place was not a dangerous place; the man was neither more nor less liable to fall because he was a workhouse master. These considerations are sufficient. The accident did not arise out of the employment in the sense that it was due to the nature of the employment or to anything to which the employment required him to expose himself." [5 B. W. C. C. 355.]

"The provision that the accident must be an accident arising out of the employment has the meaning that the accident must arise out of some risk reasonably incidental to the employment, in the sense that the man who meets with the accident must have been exposed in the course of his employment to some risk additional to those of other members of the public. Counsel for the respondent admitted that the accident in this case might just as well have happened when the deceased was sitting in his office at his desk; and applying the test I have stated it is clear that the accident in no sense arose out of the employment. There was nothing peculiar to his employment which rendered the risk of this accident happening greater than it would have been otherwise. It is not as if he was engaged in any task which was likely to render his coughing more dangerous or more frequent. In these circumstances I think the accident was brought on by the tubercular nodule which caused the fit of coughing. The coughing in its turn produced giddiness, and, owing to the giddiness, the man fell. I think we should be extending the principles of the act beyond reason, principle, or authority if we were to hold here that the accident arose out of the employment." [1912] W. C. Rep. 222.

While the workhouse master was not compelled to sit at the head of the stairs, still he was acting in the course of his employment, and his presence at that particular place was as much in the performance of his duty as would have been the case had he been in another part of the building. It is impossible to reconcile these two cases, or to arrive at any other conclusion than that the court in the latter case has absolutely rejected the view taken in Wicks v. Dowell & Co. L.R.A.1916D.

The case of Nash v. The Rangitira [1914] 3 K. B. 978, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 490, was, as the reference indicates, decided in 1914, and was an appeal from an award under the workmen's compensation act made in favor of the dependents of one Nash. Nash was employed as a seaman on the steamship Rangitira, which, at the time of the accident, was moored to a pier. Late one night, Nash, who had been ashore, returned to the ship apparently intoxicated. He walked onto the gangplank for the purpose of boarding the ship, lost his balance, fell off, and was killed. The trial judge found that the primary cause of the accident was the man's intoxicated condition, but that the accident would not have happened had he not been at the time mounting the gangplank, an incident in the performance of his duty in returning to the ship. Hence he was under a special risk, and compensation was awarded. This case was decided on the question as to whether the accident arose out of the employment, and the court said: "In one sense, whenever there is an accident to a drunken man whilst he is in the ambit of his employment it may be said that the accident arose out of the employment, because, but for his being in the place where the accident occurred, the man's drunken condition might have been immaterial. Take, for instance, the case where a man's work causes him to be close to machinery in motion, or in any other dangerous place; it may be said that his employment took him there, and that if he had been at home drunk he would, if he had fallen, have been able to lie on the floor till he was sober. In this way it may be said that this was an additional risk; but in my opinion the accident does not arise out of the employment in such circumstances. It is not sufficient that a drunken man should meet with an accident in the ambit of his employment. In the present case the accident did not arise out of the deceased man's employment."

If it is sought to distinguish the above case from the one before us on the ground that a man intoxicated is in no condition to perform the duties for which he was employed, and hence technically he is doing nothing in the performance of his employment, it may be said that the same is true of an individual who becomes unconscious through disease. So far as the employment is concerned, drunkenness and Bright's disease, as causes of a fall, are on the same footing. The sailor was required to mount the gangplank to return to the boat, and thus was in the performance of his duty. His fall, however, was caused by the drunkenness, which had no relation to his employment. This case, as well as the foregoing case of Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union, not only fails to follow the case of Wicks v. Dowell & Co., but is distinctly at variance with the principle and theory upon which the latter is based.

In the case of Robson v. Blakey [1912] W. C. Rep. 86, a plumber engaged in laying pipes in a trench on a hot day was seized with heat apoplexy. He was required to bend over his work and consequently got his back heated. The sheriff substitute found an accident arising out of the employment, and awarded compensation. This, however, was reversed on appeal, and it was finally held that the accident did not arise out of the employment. The Lord President stated in the course of his opinion: "I . . . admit that upon the decided cases there has been a fairly formidable argument presented in favor of saying that this is an accident arising out of the employment."

Certainly in that case the position of the petitioner was much stronger than in the case of Wicks v. Dowell & Co., and much stronger than that of the petitioner in the case at bar. The petitioner in Robson v. Blakey, by the nature of his employment, being obliged to work in a trench, perhaps somewhat shielded from the normal circulation of the air, and in a stooping position, exposing his back to the direct rays of the sun, might argue with far more force than the petitioner here that his difficulty arose out of his employment.

For these reasons, and upon the authorities cited and discussed, I am unable to concur in the conclusions of the majority opinion, which seem to me to ignore the long and well-established rule for determining the proximate cause of an accident, and to hold that a petitioner is entitled to compensation where, as between the proximate cause and the employment, there is no relation.

SEVEN CASES, Etc., Eckman Manufacturing Company, Owner, Plff. in Err.,
v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Commerce — drugs — false statements as to curative effects — power of Congress.

1. Congress could lawfully make contraband of interstate commerce, as misbranded, drugs which bear or contain in or upon packages or labels false and fraudulent statements as to curative or therapeutic effect.

For other cases, see Commerce, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Drugs — misbranding — statements in circulars.

2. Circulars contained in the package are comprehended by a statute declaring that a drug shall be deemed to be misbranded if its package or label shall bear or contain any statement, design, or device regarding the curative or therapeutic effect of the drug or any of the ingredients or substances contained therein, which is false and fraudulent.

For other cases, see Drugs and Druggists, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Constitutional law — due process of law — indefiniteness of penal statute.
3. There is no such uncertainty in the amendment of August 23, 1912, making contraband of interstate commerce, as misbranded, drugs which bear or contain in or upon packages or labels false and fraudulent statements as to curative or therapeutic effect, as to render the amendatory act repugnant to U. S. Const. 5th Amend., as operating as a deprivation of liberty and property without due process of law, or to the 6th Amendment, as not permitting the laying of a definite charge.

Note. — As to what constitutes misbranding within pure food and drug laws, see annotation following this case, post, 169. L.R.A.1916D.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. b. 8, in 1-52 N. S.

Pleading — libel for misbranding — statements of therapeutic effect.

4. The false and fraudulent character of the statements and circulars contained in each package of a drug, viz., "Effective as a preventative for pneumonia," and, "We know it has cured," and that it "will cure tuberculosis," is sufficiently shown in libels for the condemnation of the drugs as misbranded, in violation of the food and drugs act as amended August 23, 1912, where it is alleged that such statements were false and fraudulent, and, with respect to tuberculosis, that the statement was that the article "has cured" and "will cure," whereas "in truth and in fact" it will "not cure," and there is no "medicinal substance nor mixture of substances known at present" which can be relied on to effect a cure.

Mr. Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the court:

Libels were filed by the United States, in December, 1912, to condemn certain articles of drugs (known as "Eckman's Alternative") as misbranded in violation of § 8 of the food and drugs act. The articles had been shipped in interstate commerce, from Chicago to Omaha, and remained at the latter place unsold and in the unbroken original packages. The two cases present the same questions, the libels being identical save with respect to quantities and the persons in possession. In each case demurrers were filed by the shipper, the Eckman Manufacturing Company, which challenged both the sufficiency of the libels under the applicable provision of the statute and the constitutionality of that provision. The demurrers were overruled, and, the Eckman Company having elected to stand on the demurrers, judgments of condemnation were entered.

Section 8 of the food and drugs act, as amended by the act of August 23, 1912, chap. 352, 37 Stat. at L. 416, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8724, provides, with respect to the misbranding of drugs, as follows:

"Section 8. That the term 'misbranded,' as used herein, shall apply to all drugs or articles of food or articles which enter into the composition of food, the package or label of which shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding such article, or the ingredients or substances contained therein which shall be false or misleading in any particular, and to any food or drug product which is falsely branded as to the state, territory, or country in which it is manufactured or produced.

"That for the purposes of this act an article shall also be deemed to be misbranded. In case of drugs:

"Third. If its package or label shall bear or contain any statement, design, or device regarding the curative or therapeutic effect of such article or any of the ingredients or substances contained therein, which is false and fraudulent."

The amendment of 1912 consisted in the addition of paragraph "Third," which is the provision here involved.

It is alleged in each libel that every one of the cases of drugs sought to be condemned contained twelve bottles, each of which was labeled as follows:

"Eckman's Alternative,—contains twelve per cent of alcohol by weight, or fourteen per cent by volume—used as a solvent. For all throat and lung diseases including Bronchitis, Bronchial Catarrh, Asthma, Hay Fever, Coughs and Colds, and Catarrh of the Stomach and Bowels, and Tuberculosis (Consumption). . . . Two dollars a bottle. Prepared only by Eckman Mfg. Co. Laboratory Philadelphia, Penna., U. S. A."

And in every package containing one of the bottles, there was contained a circular with this statement:

"Effective as a preventative for Pneumonia." "We know it has cured and that it has and will cure Tuberculosis."

The libel charges that the statement "effective as a preventative for pneumonia" is "false, fraudulent, and misleading in this, to wit, that it conveys the impression to purchasers that said article of drugs can be used as an effective preventative for pneumonia, whereas, in truth and in fact, said article of drugs could not be so used;" and that the statement, "we know it has cured" and that it "will cure tuberculosis" is "false, fraudulent, and misleading in this, to wit, that it conveys the impression to purchasers that said article of drugs will cure tuberculosis, or consumption, whereas, in truth and in fact, said article of drugs would not cure tuberculosis, or consumption, there being no medicinal substance nor mixture of substances known at present which can be relied upon for the effective treatment or cure of tuberculosis, or consumption."

The principal question presented on this writ of error is with respect to the validity of the amendment of 1912.

So far as it is objected that this measure, though relating to articles transported in interstate commerce, is an encroachment upon the reserved powers of the states, the objection is not to be distinguished in substance from that which was overruled in sustaining the white slave act, 36 Stat. at L. 825, chap. 395, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8812. Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 57 L. ed. 523, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905. There, after stating that "if the facility of interstate transportation" can be denied in the case of lotteries, obscene literature, diseased cattle and persons, and impure food and drugs, the like facility could be taken away from "the systematic enticement of and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women," the court concluded with the reassertion of the simple principle that Congress is not to be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority over interstate commerce, and its power to adopt not only means necessary but convenient to its exercise, because these means may have the quality of police regulations. Id. pp. 322, 323. See Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 215, 29 L. ed. 158, 166, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826; Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45, 57, 55 L. ed. 364, 368, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 364; Lottery Case (Champion v. Ames) 188 U. S. 321, 47 L. ed. 492, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 561.

It is urged that the amendment of 1912 does not embrace circulars contained in the package, but only applies to those statements which appear on the package or on the bottles themselves; that is, it is said that the word "contain" in the amendment must have the same meaning in the case of both "package" and "label." Reference is made to the original provision in the first sentence of § 8 with respect to the statements, etc., which the package or label shall "bear." And it is insisted that if the amendment of 1912 covers statements in circulars which are contained in the package, it is unconstitutional. Such statements, it is said, are not so related to the commodity as to form part of the commerce which is within the regulating power of Congress.

But it appears from the legislative history of the act that the word "contain" was inserted in the amendment to hit precisely the case of circulars or printed matter placed inside the package, and we think that is the fair import of the provision. Cong. Rec. 62d Cong. 2d Sess. vol. 48, pt. 11, page 11,322. And the power of Congress manifestly does not depend upon the mere location of the statement accompanying the article, that is, upon the question whether the statement is on or in the package which is transported in interstate commerce. The further contention that Congress may not deal with the package thus transported in the sense of the immediate container of the article as it is intended for consumption is met by McDermott v. Wisconsin, 228 U. S. 115, 57 L. ed. 754, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 984, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 39. There the court said: "That the word 'package' or its equivalent expression, as used by Congress in §§ 7 and 8 in defining what shall constitute adulteration and what shall constitute misbranding within the meaning of the act [food and drugs act] clearly refers to the immediate container of the article which is intended for consumption by the public, there can be no question. . . . Limiting the requirements of the act as to adulteration and misbranding simply to the outside wrapping or box containing the packages intended to be purchased by the consumer, so that the importer, by removing and destroying such covering, could prevent the operation of the law on the imported article yet unsold, would render the act nugatory and its provisions wholly inadequate to accomplish the purposes for which it was passed." And, after stating that the requirements of the act, thus construed, were clearly within the power of Congress over the facilities of interstate commerce, the court added that the doctrine of original packages set forth in repeated decisions, which protected the importer in the right to sell the imported goods, was not "intended to limit the right of Congress, now asserted, to keep the channels of interstate commerce free from the carriage of injurious or fraudulently branded articles, and to choose appropriate means to that end." Id. pp. 130, 131, 137.

Referring to the nature of the statements which are within the purview of the amendment, it is said that a distinction should be taken between articles that are illicit, immoral, or harmful and those which are legitimate, and "that the amendment goes beyond statements dealing with identity or ingredients. But the question remains as to what may be regarded as "illicit," and we find no ground for saying that Congress may not condemn the interstate transportation of swindling preparations designed to cheat credulous sufferers, and make such preparations, accompanied by false and fraudulent statements, illicit with respect to interstate commerce, as well as, for example, lottery tickets. The fact that the amendment is not limited, as was the original statute, to statements regarding identity or composition (United States v. Johnson, 221 U. S. 488, 55 L. ed. 823, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 627), does not mark a constitutional distinction. The false and fraudulent statement which the amendment describes accompanies the article in the package, and thus gives to the article its character in interstate commerce.

Finally, the statute is attacked upon the ground that it enters the domain of speculation (American School v. McAnnulty, 187 U. S. 94, 47 L. ed. 90, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33), and by virtue of consequent uncertainty operates as a deprivation of liberty and property without due process of law, in violation of the 5th Amendment of the Constitution, and does not permit of the laying of a definite charge as required by the 6th Amendment. We think that this objection proceeds upon a misconstruction of the provision. Congress deliberately excluded the field where there are honest differences of opinion between schools and practitioners. Cong. Rec. 62d Cong. 2d Sess. vol. 48, pt. 12, Appx. p. 675. It was, plainly, to leave no doubt upon this point that the words "false and fraudulent" were used. This phrase must be taken with its accepted legal meaning, and thus it must be found that the statement contained in the package was put there to accompany the goods with actual intent to deceive,—an intent which may be derived from the facts and circumstances, but which must be established. Id. 676. That false and fraudulent representations may be made with respect to the curative effect of substances is obvious. It is said that the owner has the right to give his views regarding the effect of his drugs. But state of mind is itself a fact, and may be a material fact, and false and fraudulent representations may be made about it; and persons who make or deal in substances or compositions alleged to be curative are in a position to have superior knowledge, and may be held to good faith in their statements. Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 69, 92, 3 L. ed. 271, 279; Durland v. United States, 161 U. S. 306, 313, 40 L. ed. 709, 711, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; Stebbins v. Eddy, 4 Mason, 414, 423, Fed. Cas. No. 13,342; Kohler Mfg. Co. v. Beeshore, 59 Fed. 572, 574; Missouri Drug Co. v. Wyman, 129 Fed. 623, 628; McDonald v. Smith, 139 Mich. 211, 102 N. W. 668; Hedin v. Minneapolis Medical & S. Institute, 62 Minn. 146, 149, 35 L.R.A. 417, 54 Am. St. Rep. 628, 64 N. W. 158; Hickey v. Morrell, 102 N. Y. 454, 463, 55 Am. Rep. 824, 7 N. E. 321; Reg. v. Giles, 10 Cox, C. C. 44, Leigh & C. C. C. 502, 34 L. J. Mag. Cas. 50, 11 Jur. N. S. 119, 11 L. T. N. S. 643, 13 Week. Rep. 327; Smith v. Land & House Property Corp. L. R. 28 Ch. Div. 7, 15, 51 L. T. N. S. 718, 49 J. P. 182. It cannot be said, for example, that one who should put inert matter or a worthless composition in the channels of trade, labeled or described in an accompanying circular as a cure for disease, when he knows it is not, is beyond the reach of the lawmaking power. Congress recognized that there was a wide field in which assertions as to curative effect are in no sense honest expressions of opinion, but constitute absolute falsehoods, and in the nature of the case can be deemed to have been made only with fraudulent purpose. The amendment of 1912 applies to this field and we have no doubt of its validity.

With respect to the sufficiency of the averments of the libels, it is enough to say that these averments should receive a sensible construction. There must be a definite charge of the statutory offense, but we are not at liberty to indulge in hypercriticism in order to escape the plain import of the words used. There is no question as to the adequacy of the description of the article, or of the shipments, or of the packages. It is said that there was no proper statement of the contents of the circular. But the libels give the words of the circular, and we think that the allegations were sufficient to show the manner in which they were used. The objection that it was not alleged that the statements in question appeared on the original packages or on the bottles themselves, as already pointed out, is based on a misconstruction of the statutory provision. The remaining and most important criticism is that the libels did not sufficiently show that the statements were false and fraudulent. But it was alleged that they were false and fraudulent, and with respect to tuberculosis it was averred that the statement was that the article "has cured" and "will cure," whereas "in truth and in fact" it would "not cure," and that there was no "medicinal substance nor mixture of substances known at present" which could be relied upon to effect a cure. We think that this was enough to apprise those interested in the goods of the charge which they must meet. It was, in substance, a charge that, contrary to the statute, the article had been made the subject of interstate transportation with a statement contained in the package that the article had cured and would cure tuberculosis, and that this statement was contrary to the fact, and was made with actual intent to deceive.

Judgments affirmed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

Smith*, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 946, upon the general subject of instigation or consent to crime for the purpose of detecting a criminal, as a defense to prosecution.

During recent years statutes have been passed in most, if not all, jurisdictions, regulating the manufacture and marketing of food products, and in many cases also of drugs, and these statutes have almost uniformly been upheld as a valid exercise of the police power for the protection of the public against unwholesome and harmful preparations, and adulterations and imitations of, and substitutes for, known articles. See note in 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 875. One requirement of most of these statutes is that articles within their scope shall be so branded or labeled as to show truthfully certain facts regarding their identity, composition, quantity, source, etc., and it is the construction of this statutory requirement with which this annotation deals.

General rule of construction.

In construing the brands or labels on food products or drugs alleged to be misbranded, the words used should be given their ordinary and customary meaning, so far as they have one, rather than the scientific or technical meaning. (United States v. 75 Boxes of Alleged Pepper (1912) 198 Fed. 934; United States v. 150 Cases of Fruit Pudding (1914) 211 Fed. 360), or the commercial significance which they have acquired among manufacturers and dealers (Libby, McNeill & Libby v. United States (1913) 127 C. C. A. 14, 210 Fed. 148), different from the ordinary and popular meaning.

As stated in United States v. 75 Boxes of Alleged Pepper (Fed.) supra: "It is difficult to perceive how otherwise justice could be done in any given case, or what practical efficiency the statute would have, or what protection it would afford, if the public were required to have scientific and technical knowledge as to the derivation and nomenclature of the various food and drug products. The ordinary purchaser, unless he could rely upon the common and generally understood signification of a label, could never be certain of what he was buying. A label should be reliable to the extent that it will not in any wise, or to any extent, mislead such a purchaser."

And so, a food product in which no fruit, in the common meaning of the word, is used, is misbranded if labeled "Fruit Flavored," although "the grain out of which the product is manufactured is, botanically speaking, a fruit." United States v. 150 Cases of Fruit Pudding (Fed.) supra.

Intent.

In proceedings under the Federal food and drugs act or insecticide act for the condemnation of misbranded articles, the intent of the claimant is immaterial, the sole question being whether the articles are so labeled or branded as to deceive and mislead the purchaser. United States v. 36 Bottles of London Dry Gin (1914) 127 C. C. A. 119, 210 Fed. 271, reversing (1913) 205 Fed. 111; United States v. 2 Cases of Chloro-Naphtholeum Disinfectant (1914) 217 Fed. 477; United States v. 267 Boxes of Macaroni (1915) 225 Fed. 79.

Nor is intent an element of the offense of misbranding under the Federal food and drugs act. Weeks v. United States (1915) 139 C. C. A. 626, 224 Fed. 64.

Statements as to nature or identity of article.

Soda water contained in bottles having blown therein the words, "The contents of this bottle manufactured by the Phos-Ferrone Manufacturing Company, Phos-Ferrone," is misbranded within the Missouri food and drugs law of 1907; it appearing that soda water and phosphorane are different substances, and their names indicate a different composition, and also that the soda water in the bottles was not made by the Phos-Fer-rone Manufacturing Company. State v. Lief (1913) 248 Mo. 722, 154 S. W. 1133.

So, under the Federal food and drugs act, cheap, ordinary, low grade carbonated white wine, which is in fact offered for sale and sold as champagne, and which is put up and labeled in close imitation of champagne, and bears the words "extra dry," which are false as applied to it,—is misbranded in that it is an imitation, and is offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article, and is so labeled as to deceive and mislead the purchaser, although the word "champagne" nowhere appears on the label. United States v. 5 Cases of Champagne (1913) 205 Fed. 817.

And ordinary Croton water drawn from a pipe in New York city and thoroughly filtered, and bottled with the addition of a little mineral salt and carbonic acid gas, is misbranded if labeled "Imperial Spring Water," as the label is misleading, although the water is pure and wholesome. United States v. Morgan (1910) 181 Fed. 587, which, however, granted a motion in arrest of judgment for want of allegation and proof of notice and a preliminary hearing; judgment granting motion in arrest reversed in (1911) 222 U. S. 274, 56 L. ed. 198, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81, on the ground that such notice and hearing were not a condition precedent to the prosecution.

Likewise, an article of food made of ground cocoanut, sugar, and the white of eggs, which is labeled and shipped as "Macaroons," is misbranded, if a macaroon, as commonly understood, is made of ground almonds, sugar, and the white of eggs. Washburn v. United States (1915) 140 C. C. A. 81, 224 Fed. 395.

And a food product which is labeled merely "Condensed Skimmed Milk," while it contains 42 per cent of cane sugar, is misbranded, where it appears that unsweetened condensed skimmed milk is also produced and sold. Libby, McNeill & Libby v. United States (1913) 127 C. C. A. 14, 210 Fed. 148.

In Washburn v. United States (Fed.) supra, it was further held that, if the jury found that a "macaroon" consisted of cocoanut, sugar, and the white of eggs, then an article of food containing also glucose and branded "Macaroons" was misbranded within the meaning of § 8, subdivs. 1 and 4 (1) of the Federal act, as it was "an imitation of, or offered for sale under the distinctive name of, another article," and was labeled so as to deceive and mislead the purchaser.

In this case, however, which was a prosecution upon an information in two L.R.A.1916D.

counts, charging both adulteration and misbranding of the same article, the court, after concluding that the verdict on the first count, charging adulteration, must be set aside for other reasons, said: "Furthermore, it seems to us that the trial on the first count proceeded upon a wrong theory, and that the allegations and proofs offered would not warrant a conviction for adulteration within the meaning of the act. The evidence discloses that a macaroon is a mixed food composed of certain ingredients; that the name by which it is known is distinctive; and that the added ingredient, glucose, which the respondent used in its cakes, was not poisonous or deleterious to health. It is provided in § 8, subdiv. 4 (1), that a mixture known by a distinctive name shall not be regarded as adulterated if it does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredient. The added ingredient here in question was neither poisonous nor deleterious, and, as the mixture or compound was known by a distinctive name, it was not adulterated within the meaning of the act." And as § 8, subdiv. 4 (1), referred to, provides not only that such an article shall not be regarded as adulterated, but also, in the same phrase, that it shall not be deemed to be misbranded, it is difficult to see why this reasoning does not apply also to the second count, charging misbranding. The court, however, affirmed the decree so far as it related to this count, on the ground that, as above stated, if the jury found that a macaroon consisted of cocoanut, sugar, and the white of eggs, then the defendant's article containing also glucose, and branded "Macaroons," was in "imitation of, or offered for sale under the distinctive name of, another article," which is excluded from the proviso to § 8, subdiv. 4 (1). But it is also difficult to see why this reasoning would not likewise prevent the application of the proviso to the charge under the first count of the information.

In Brina v. United States (1910) 105 C. C. A. 558, 179 Fed. 373, cottonseed oil contained in cans labeled salad oil was held to be misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act. The court said: "The trial judge held, and so charged the jury, that 'as a notorious fact salad oil prima facie means olive oil,' but allowed the defendant to show if he could that 'it means something else because of recent events which have perhaps rendered olive oil more difficult to obtain, or that other food elements have come to be known as salad oil.' No such proof was introduced, and the ruling is assigned as error. The Century Dictionary, Worcester's, Stormont's Imperial, and the Encyclopedia all define 'salad oil' as 'olive oil.' Webster's does not give any definition. We are satisfied that the trial judge quite properly charged, in the absence of any testimony of the sort suggested, that 'salad oil prima facie imports olive oil; that is what the world has been accustomed to regard as salad oil.'

But in Von Bremen v. United States (1912) 113 C. C. A. 296, 192 Fed. 904, it was held that sesame oil, or (obiter) cottonseed oil, labeled "salad oil," is not misbranded in that the label is false and misleading as indicating that the article is olive oil, or deceives and misleads the purchaser into believing that it is olive oil, if it is shown that enormous quantities of edible oils made from cottonseed, from the seed of sesame, from peanuts, and from corn have been sold as "salad oil," and that olive oil is almost invariably labeled and sold as "olive oil;" that the trade does not understand "salad oil" to mean olive oil; and that purchasers of other than olive oil, as "salad oil," have not been misled or deceived.

And a liquid having a vanilla flavor, but containing no extract from the vanilla bean, which is labeled "Nectar Choice Flavor of Vanilla, sugar colored, for flavoring," etc., is not misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, as the words "flavor" and "extract" are not synonymous. United States v. St. Louis Coffee & Spice Mills (1909) 189 Fed. 191.

Statement as to composition of article.

A combination of ground black pepper and ground long pepper, which is labeled "Pure Pepper," is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, if it is shown that "pure pepper" means, in the trade and in the market, black pepper and nothing else. United States v. 75 Boxes of Alleged Pepper (1912) 198 Fed. 934.

And an article which contains 65 per cent of white pepper and 35 per cent of a corn product, and is labeled "Compound White Pepper" in large and plain letters, and about an inch thereunder, in small and inconspicuous type, "Composed of ground white pepper and ground cereals," is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, as the term "Compound White Pepper" (not necessarily importing the same idea as "White Pepper Compound") "does not so naturally imply, to the average purchaser, a mixture of white pepper with an ingredient other than pepper as to make it a proper L.R.A.1916D.

branding, as against the fact (as alleged) that the statement of the ingredients is so placed and in such type as not to be readily noticed by the purchaser, and as to be calculated and intended to deceive and mislead the latter." Frank v. United States (1911) 113 C. C. A. 188, 192 Fed. 864.

Likewise, a food product consisting chiefly of imitation "wild cherry essence artificially colored," which is labeled "Fruit Wild Cherry Compound," is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, in that the label is misleading and deceptive to the public as conveying to the mind a representation that the dominant element in the combination is genuine fruit wild cherry, to which something else, such as an essence or extract, has been added. United States v. Weeks (1912) 225 Fed. 1017.

And tomato catsup to which pumpkin has been added as a filler—conceding that the result is an article which may be described as a compound—is misbranded if merely marked "Compound" on the package, without indicating the substances composing it. William Henning & Co. v. United States (1912) 113 C. C. A. 382, 193 Fed. 52.

But a food product consisting of an imitation wild cherry essence and fruit wild cherry, which is labeled "Fruit Wild Cherry Compound," is not misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, although the ingredients of the compound are not stated. United States v. Weeks (Fed.) supra.

"Where there is no proof that the words 'Hudson's Extract' have a well-known trade meaning, an imitation of vanilla marked 'Hudson's Extract', without giving any indication of what the article is composed, shows a clear case of misbranding under the pure food law." Hudson Mfg. Co. v. United States (1912) 113 C. C. A. 625, 192 Fed. 920.

But an article of food consisting of a compound of lemon terpene and citral, which is labeled "Special Lemon. Lemon Terpene and Citral," is not misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, in that the label is misleading as indicating that the article is a product derived from lemons. Weeks v. United States (1915) 139 C. C. A. 626, 224 Fed. 64.

And a fluid containing no measurable amount of lemon oil, which is an essential ingredient of pure lemon flavor, but containing citral, not derived from the lemon fruit, is not shown to be misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, when labeled "Flavor of Lemon.

and Citral—a Pure Flavor,” if it is not shown that the oil of lemon is an essential ingredient of a pure flavor of lemon and citral. Nave-McCord Mercantile Co. v. United States (1910) 104 C. C. A. 486, 82 Fed. 46.

An insecticide labeled “Sulpho-Napthol,” which contains less than four tenths of 1 per cent of sulphur, the presence of which is due to chemical or accidental impurities in the raw materials employed, and does not in any appreciable way affect the usefulness of the article, is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal insecticide act of 1910. United States v. 2 Cases of Sulpho-Napthol (1914) 213 Fed. 519.

And a disinfectant labeled “Chloro-Naptholeum,” which contains neither chlorin nor chlor-napthol, is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal insecticide act of 1910, in that the label is false and misleading, and the article so labeled as to deceive a purchaser of normal capacity, who uses that capacity in a common-sense way, where it appears that chlorin has long been recognized as a valuable disinfectant and is extensively used in purifying the water supplies of urban communities; that napthol is also a well-known and powerful germicide; and that the name chlor-napthol has long been given to a definite chemical compound which is also a powerful germicide,—although a large majority of the purchasers of the article in question may not know these facts, or be misled by the name applied to the article. United States v. 2 Cases of Chloro-Naptholeum Disinfectant (1914) 217 Fed. 477.

And under the declaration of § 8 of the Federal insecticide act of 1910, that an insecticide, other than Paris green or lead arsenate, which “consists partially or completely of an inert substance or substances which do not prevent, destroy, repel, or mitigate insects or fungi,” is misbranded unless it has “the names and percentage amounts of each and every one of such inert ingredients plainly and correctly stated on the label,” or the producer states “plainly upon the label the correct names and percentage amounts of each and every ingredient of the insecticide or fungicide having insecticidal or fungicidal properties,” and as to the inert ingredients merely states the total percentage thereof present,—“Roach Food” is misbranded, which contains wheat flour and small quantities of other substances which do not prevent, destroy, repel, or mitigate insects, without having on the label either of the alternative statements required by the act, L.R.A.1916D.

although the substances are in the nature of food or bait attractive to the insects which it is sought to kill, and are necessary to induce them to eat the poison compounded therewith, which alone would not produce the desired result. United States v. 30 Dozen Packages of Roach Food (1913) 202 Fed. 271.

Candy containing 1 $\frac{1}{100}$  per cent of alcohol, which is labeled “Chocolates,” without stating the proportion of alcohol contained therein, is misbranded within the Oregon pure food law of February 26th, 1915, which provides that an article shall be deemed to be misbranded, if (among other things) it fails to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, etc. Hoefler v. Mickle (1915) — Or. —, 153 Pac. 417.

And under the provisions of § 8 of the Federal pure food and drugs act of 1906, that a drug shall be deemed to be misbranded if its label shall be false or misleading in any particular, or shall fail to state the quantity or proportion of certain enumerated substances, or any derivative or preparation of any of such substances, contained therein, a drug containing one of such derivatives is misbranded unless the label thereon, in addition to stating the quantity of such derivative, by name, also states the substance from which such derivative is produced, in order to make the warning of the label complete. United States v. Antikamnia Chemical Co. (1914) 231 U. S. 654, 58 L. ed. 419, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 49, reversing (1912) 37 App. D. O. 343.

And in State v. Intoxicating Liquors (1909) 106 Me. 135, 76 Atl. 268, it was held that liquor of which the alcoholic contents is less, and the residuum much more, than the standard test for whisky in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, and which is labeled as monogram whisky and marked merely “Blend,” without a statement of the standard of strength, quality, or purity, is misbranded within the provisions of the Federal food and drugs act, which prohibit interstate commerce in any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded, and define the term “drug” as including all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, and declare that a drug shall be deemed to be adulterated, if, when sold under a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity as determined by the test laid down therein, without bearing upon the container a plain statement of the standard of strength, quality, or purity.

It is not a necessary condition of a finding that a drug is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, that a statement on the label regarding the composition of the drug should be flatly and baldly false, but the drug is misbranded, if the jury find that the statement in question is such as to create or lead to a false impression in the mind of the reader as to what the ingredients or the composition of the drug is. United States v. American Laboratories (1915) 222 Fed. 104.

But an article labeled "Peroxide Cream" is not misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act by reason of the fact that it contains only an insignificant quantity of peroxide. United States v. American Druggists' Syndicate (1911) 186 Fed. 387.

A syrup made from cane sugar and a product of some treatment of maple wood, which bears a label consisting of the words "Ohio" above and "Maple Syrup" below, in red, with the word "Blended" between in blue, and below these words, in smaller type, the statement that "this syrup is made from the sugar maple tree and cane sugar," is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, in that the label is misleading as conveying the idea that the product contains at least some maple syrup, whereas, in fact, it contains none at all as the term "maple syrup" is popularly understood. United States v. Scanlon (1908) 180 Fed. 485.

But it has been held that a syrup consisting largely of refined cane sugar flavored with an extract of maple wood, which is labeled "blended" maple syrup, is not misbranded within the Federal food and drugs act, in that the label is misleading; the proviso to § 8, "In the case of food," subdiv. "Fourth," providing, in legal effect, that an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be misbranded if labeled so as to indicate plainly that it is a "blend," and the word "blend" is plainly stated on the package; and the term "blend" so used shall be construed to mean a mixture of like substances, not excluding harmless flavoring ingredients used for the purpose of flavoring only. United States v. 68 Cases of Syrup (1909) 172 Fed. 781.

And a syrup composed of 90 per cent of white sugar and 10 per cent maple sugar, which is labeled "Gold Leaf Syrup," composed of "maple and white sugar," with the name of the maker and a trademark consisting of a maple leaf printed in gold, with stalks of sugar cane projecting on each side, is not misbranded within the Federal act, in that the label is misleading as representing, and tending to make a purchaser believe, that the article is composed principally of maple sugar. Re Wilson (1909) 168 Fed. 566.

Similarly, an article of food consisting principally of glucose and starch sugar, with some honey added, which is labeled, "Compound: Pure Comb and Strained Honey and Corn Syrup," is not misbranded, within the meaning of the Federal act of 1906, merely in that the label is misleading as holding out to the public that "pure comb honey" is the principal ingredient. United States v. Boeckmann (1910) 176 Fed. 382.

And molasses containing from 30 to 40 per cent of commercial glucose, which may properly be labeled and sold as "Corn Syrup," which molasses bears labels having the words "Sugar House Molasses" in large letters, but distinctly stating in three places that it is a compound of molasses and corn syrup, is not misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, in that the labels are misleading as conveying the impression that the substance is pure sugar house molasses. United States v. 779 Cases of Molasses (1909) 98 C. C. A. 197, 174 Fed. 325.

Under the Michigan statute "in relation to the sale of corn syrup," which prohibits the sale, etc., of any cane syrup, beet syrup, or glucose, unless the package containing it be distinctly branded or labeled with the true and appropriate name; or of any cane syrup or beet syrup mixed with glucose, unless the package containing it be distinctly branded or labeled "Glucose Mixture" or "Corn Syrup," etc.,—a syrup composed of 90 per cent pure syrup made entirely from corn, commercially called "glucose" or "corn syrup," and 10 per cent cane syrup, which composition is labeled corn syrup, with a statement of the formula of the contents of the package, as follows, "Corn syrup, 90 per cent, cane syrup, 10 per cent," is not misbranded in that it describes the corn syrup element as "corn syrup," instead of "glucose." People v. Harris (1903) 135 Mich. 136, 97 N. W. 402.

But in McDermott v. State (1910) 143 Wis. 18, 126 N. W. 888, 21 Ann. Cas. 1315, which was a prosecution for selling a mixture of glucose and cane syrup labeled, in one case, "Karo Corn Syrup; 10 per cent Cane Syrup, 90 per cent Corn Syrup," and, in another case, "Karo Corn Syrup with Cane flavor; Corn Syrup 85 per cent," in violation of the Wisconsin statute prohibiting the sale of any of the specified syrups or any molasses or glucose unless it is true to name and labeled with the true name, or any syrup or molasses mixed with glucose unless it is so labeled as to show plainly the true name of each and all the ingredients, and prescribing that if the proportion of glucose in a syrup and glucose mixture exceeds 75 per cent, the mixture shall be labeled by adding the name of the syrup used as the name of a flavoring, as "Glucose flavored with Maple Syrup," or "Cane Syrup," as the case may be,—it was held that the court below was justified in finding that pure glucose was not a syrup in the sense in which the term was commonly used and applied to these articles of table foods, and that the terms "glucose" and "corn syrup" were not synonymous in their trade meaning and use as applied to articles of table food; and that the natural result of the use of the term "corn syrup" to indicate a mixture of glucose and syrup was to mislead the consumers into the belief that they were obtaining a table syrup of the variety and kind commonly known as syrup, the product of sugar producing plants, and the consequences of such practice were that the consumers were misled and deceived in respect to the actual nature, the constituents, and the value of the article as a food product. The judgment of the Wisconsin court was, however, reversed by the United States Supreme Court, in (1913) 228 U. S. 116, 57 L. ed. 754, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 984, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 39, on the ground that the Wisconsin statute was invalid as conflicting with the Federal food and drugs act, and interfering with interstate commerce in forbidding all labels other than the one it prescribed.

A syrup composed of sugar, citric and tartaric acid, and the juices of certain fruits, not including pomegranates, which is labeled "Grenadine Syrup," is not misbranded in that the label is deceptive or misleading as tending to induce purchasers to believe that the syrup is composed only of sugar and the juice of pomegranates, where it is shown that, according to the accepted meaning of the words "Grenadine Syrup," they signify only a syrup having a certain color and characteristic flavor, and not a syrup actually made from pomegranates. United States v. 30 Cases (1912) 199 Fed. 932.

flax bran, oat and hominy feeds," followed by the name of the manufacturer and a guaranteed analysis, is not misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, by reason of the fact that it contains a quantity of oat hulls in excess of the amount that would have been naturally and normally present in case whole ground oats had been used in lieu of the same amount of the by-product of oatmeal or rolled oat factories contained in the mixture, as the words "oat feed" properly mean such by-product, containing a large proportion of oat hulls, and should not, especially when used in juxtaposition with the word "oats," as on this label, lead anyone to believe that the whole ground or crushed grain is meant. United States v. 1 Carload of Corno Horse & Mule Feed (1911) 188 Fed. 453.

But a food for domestic animals containing 30 per cent of cornmeal and but 12 per cent of protein, which is labeled "XXX Mixed Feed . . . Guaranteed Analysis. Protein 13.81 per cent . . . Made from: Wheat Middlings. Corn." is misbranded within the Kentucky pure food law which provides that "an article of food shall be deemed misbranded: (1) If the package or label shall bear . . . any statement purporting to name the substances of which such article is made, which statement shall not give fully the name or names of all substances contained in any measurable quantity." W. H. Small & Co. v. Com. (1909) 134 Ky. 272, 120 S. W. 361.

Under a statute requiring labels on foods which are mixtures or compounds to show that fact, a label for a food compounded of meat and cereal is sufficient which states that it is sausage and cereal, without stating the addition of water, although water is also an ingredient of the mixture. Armour & Co. v. State Dairy & Food Com'r. (Armour & Co. v. Bird) (1909) 159 Mich. 1, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 616, 123 N. W. 580.

And a label stating that "This Baking Powder contains the following ingredients and none other: Starch, Egg, Phosphate, Bicarb. Soda, Sodium Aluminium Sulphate," used on baking powder consisting of bicarbonate of soda, calcium acid phosphate, sodium aluminium sulphate, egg albumen, and corn starch, is a substantial compliance with the requirement of the Oregon food laws, that all baking powder must "have printed on the label in plain English, free from all technical or chemical phrases, . . . the names of all ingredients composing" it. Crescent Mfg. Co. v. Mickel (1914) 216 Fed. 246.

And an article of food labeled "O'Donohue's Fifth Avenue Salad Dressing" is not misbranded in violation of the New York agricultural law, in that the label does not state the ingredients of the article, as such a statement is required only when the article is an imitation or adulteration of some standard article of food; there being no proof that there is a standard merchantable salad dressing, and that the article in question is not that article, or that any ingredient of the article in question is unwholesome or foreign to true salad dressing. People v. Henderson (1911) 74 Misc. 577, 131 N. Y. Supp. 997.

Under § 165 of the New York agricultural law, which provides that an article of food shall be deemed to be misbranded if it be an imitation of, or offered for sale under the distinctive name of, another article, or if the package containing it, or its label, bears any false or misleading statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein: Provided, that an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be misbranded, if it is a mixture or compound known by its own distinctive name, and is not an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article, or if it is an article so labeled as to indicate plainly that it is a mixture, compound, combination, imitation, or blend, and to show the character and constituents thereof,—“tomato catsup” labeled, “Prepared from whole ripe tomatoes, no artificial color, and contains one tenth (1/10) of soda benzoate,” but which is artificially colored and contains benzoic acid and <sup>22</sup>/<sub>100</sub> of 1 per cent of soda benzoate, is misbranded; the proviso in the statute having no application to the article in question. People v. Luke (1907) 122 App. Div. 64, 106 N. Y. Supp. 621.

And a compound composed of vanillin, cummerin, spirits, sugar, coloring, and water, which is contained in a bottle upon which is a label bearing, in large full-face type, the words “Peerless Extract of Vanilla,” is misbranded, under the same section, although the bottle also has, on the reverse side thereof, a small white strip of paper upon which is printed in small type the following: “Formula Vanilline Cumberin Spirits Sugar Coloring Water;” such article so labeled not being within the proviso. People v. Butler (1909) 134 App. Div. 151, 118 N. Y. Supp. 849, reversing a judgment of the municipal court in favor of the defendant, which dismissed the L.R.A.1916D.

complaint, and ordering a new trial; appeal dismissed without opinion in (1910) 200 N. Y. 556, 93 N. E. 1127; judgment of the municipal court affirmed, after a new trial, on the authority of the judgment on the first appeal, in (1912) 148 App. Div. 928, 133 N. Y. Supp. 1137, which was affirmed without opinion in (1914) 212 N. Y. 613, 106 N. E. 1037.

Under the proviso to the “Fourth” subdiv. of § 8 of the Federal food and drugs act, “In the case of food,” that an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredient shall not be deemed misbranded, if it is a mixture or compound known as an article of food under its own distinctive name, etc., an article known and sold under the distinctive name of “Coca Cola” is not misbranded by reason of any false statement or suggestion contained in the name itself, if there is no other article having this distinctive name, although the separate words of the name are indicative of distinct articles, but are not, otherwise than as applied to this article, used together to describe any combination of the two distinct articles. United States v. 40 Barrels & 20 Kegs of Coca Cola (1914) 132 C. C. A. 47, 215 Fed. 535, affirming (1911) 191 Fed. 431.

And the use of the words “Cream Vanilla” and “Rose Vanilla,” which have been adopted as artificial and distinctive names for certain flavors and colors of a proprietary food product known as “Pudding,” is protected by the same proviso, and does not constitute misbranding, although the products sold under such names may be flavored with synthetic vanillin, instead of the natural product in the form of the vegetable extract of vanilla. United States v. 150 Cases of Fruit Pudding (1914) 211 Fed. 360.

And under the second part of the proviso, that an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be misbranded, if it is an article labeled, branded, or tagged so as to indicate plainly that it is a compound, and the word “compound” is plainly stated on the package in which it is offered for sale, etc.,—an article of food containing no poisonous or deleterious ingredients, which is labeled “Fruit Wild Cherry Compound,” has been held not to be misbranded, although it contains no “fruit wild cherry.” Weeks v. United States (1915) 139 C. C. A. 626, 224 Fed. 64.

But this proviso “was only intended to protect an article sold under its distinctive name from the charge of misbranding in so far as any statement or suggestion contained in the name itself is concerned, and . . . was not intended to prevent the condemnation of the article as misbranded, even though sold under its own distinctive name, if in addition to such distinctive name the label contains other misleading statements, designs, or devices." United States v. 40 Barrels & 20 Kegs of Coca Cola (1911) 191 Fed. 431, affirmed on other points in (1914) 132 C. C. A. 47, 215 Fed. 535.

And so, a food product known by the distinctive name "Puddine" or "Fruit Puddine," in which no fruit, in the common meaning of the word, is used, but which is labeled "Fruit Flavored," is misbranded within the meaning of the Federal act, in that the words "fruit flavored" are false and misleading, as the protection afforded by the proviso is limited to the distinctive name, and does not include other false or misleading words or statements on the label on such an article. United States v. 150 Cases of Fruit Puddine (Fed.) supra.

Statements as to source of article.

Under the provision of § 8 of the Federal food and drugs act, that the word "misbranded" shall apply to any food or drug product which is falsely branded as to the state, territory, or country in which it is produced, apples and blackberries grown in Arkansas and there bought and canned by a Michigan firm, which are labeled "Tepee Apples [or Blackberries]. Packed by C. H. Godfrey & Son, Benton Harbor and Watervliet, Mich.," are misbranded in that the label is misleading and false as leading purchasers to believe that the fruit was grown as well as packed in Michigan. United States v. 100 Cases of Tepee Apples (1908) 179 Fed. 985.

And under the further provision that "an article shall also be deemed to be misbranded: . . . In the case of food: . . . Second. If it be labeled or branded so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser, or purport to be a foreign product when not so,"—domestic white wine, artificially carbonated and labeled "Extra Dry Champagne," with words in French and other details of "dress" tending to create in the minds of purchasers the impression that it is a foreign and not a domestic product,—is misbranded. Schraubstadter v. United States (1912) 118 C. C. A. 42, 199 Fed. 568.

And domestic-made macaroni bearing a label which is very distinctly Italian in general appearance, which does not state the name of the manufacturer or the place where the macaroni is made, L.R.A.1916D.

which has nearly all of the wording thereon in the Italian language, and contains the name of a city in Italy where macaroni is extensively made, is misbranded in that it is so labeled as to mislead the purchaser by conveying the impression that it is of foreign manufacture, notwithstanding the label also bears, in small type, within less than an inch of space, on the very narrow white margin on the lower edge of the label, the letters "Mfg. U. S. A." United States v. 267 Boxes of Macaroni (1915) 225 Fed. 79.

Likewise, under the pure food regulation adopted pursuant to the pure food law, that "the use of a geographical name in connection with a food or drug product will not be deemed a misbranding when, by reason of long usage, it has come to represent a generic term, and is used to indicate a style, type, or brand; but in such cases, the state or territory where any such article is manufactured or produced shall be stated upon the principal label,"—the geographical name of "Mocha" may be used in connection with coffee grown in either Arabia or Abyssinia, but the word "Abyssinian" must be used in connection therewith to cover coffee grown in Abyssinia, and the word "Arabian," in connection therewith, to cover coffee grown in Arabia, and either coffee is misbranded if labeled merely "Mocha." United States v. Thomson & T. Spice Co. (1912) 198 Fed. 565.

But a domestic gin which is labeled "London Dry Gin" is not misbranded, in that it purports to be a foreign product when not so, or in that the label is deceptive and misleading, if the jury find, on proper evidence, that the term "London Dry Gin" designates a distinct and well-known kind of gin having certain characteristics that identify it wherever it may be made, rather than the place of origin. United States v. 36 Bottles of London Dry Gin (1913) 205 Fed. 111, reversed and a new trial granted, on another ground in (1914) 127 C. C. A. 119, 210 Fed. 271.

And in United States v. Schurman (1910) 177 Fed. 581, which was an application for leave to file an information for an alleged violation of the Federal pure food act in misbranding a domestic food product by labeling it "Genuine Dutch Tea Rusk, made in Holland, Mich., by the Michigan Tea Rusk Company, Holland, Mich.," and having the word "Holland," where it first occurred, in type so large and prominent as to hold the attention and thus mislead purchasers into supposing that the article was a genuine importation from the country of Holland,—the application was denied, with leave to renew the same at any time upon a further showing that, after notice from the Department of Agriculture of a conclusion that the label was improper, or after knowledge of the disposition of this motion, the respondents should continue to use the word "genuine" upon their labels, or to give undue prominence to the word "Holland;" the court saying that "in a case like this, where the violation is doubtful, and where the respondents seem to have acted in good faith in being willing to comply with the law and the rules, if they could find out what the law and the rules were, it is extremely improbable that any jury would find, beyond a reasonable doubt, the existence of the essential misleading, and, upon the same principle which requires a grand jury not to indict unless it is reasonably probable that a conviction might follow, this information should not be filed."

Statements as to strength, quality, grade, or purity of article.

An insecticide labeled "Inert Substance. Water 7%, Insecticide 93%," which in fact contains over 10 per cent of water, is misbranded within the meaning of the insecticide act of 1910. United States v. 2 Cases of Sulpho-Naphthol (1914) 213 Fed. 519.

And an article of food labeled "Extract Terpeneless Lemon" is misbranded if it contains only .05 per cent of citral derived from oil of lemon, while terpeneless extract of lemon, according to established standards of purity, contains or should contain, not less than .2 per cent of citral derived from oil of lemon. United States v. Frank (1911) 189 Fed. 195.

But flour containing 90 per cent of the flour content of the wheat is not misbranded in being labeled "patent flour," where there is no fixed standard as to the percentage of the flour content which may properly be termed "patent flour," and that term does not connote any fixed or maximum percentage of the flour content of the wheat berry, but means merely flour containing less than the total of the flour content of the wheat. Lexington Mill & Elevator Co. v. United States (1913) 121 C. C. A. 23, 202 Fed. 615, affirmed on other points in (1914) 232 U. S. 399, 58 L. ed. 658, L.R.A.1915B, 774, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337.

And a Missouri grain dealer who contracted to sell No 2 red wheat according to Missouri state inspection is not guilty of misbranding a carload of wheat L.R.A.1916D.

shipped to Texas under the contract, with an invoice describing it as "2 red wheat, . . . K. C. Wts. and Grades," where he never saw the load of wheat, or had anything to do with its shipment, except to order the operator of a public elevator to ship out No. 2 red wheat, and the operator loaded a car with wheat out of the bin containing that grade, which an official inspector of the state of Missouri then inspected in the car, and adjudged and certified to be No. 2 red wheat, and the elevator operator caused the carload to be forwarded to Texas, although, when the load of wheat arrived in Texas, a Texas inspector, a Federal inspector, and others inspected it and found it not to be "No. 2 red wheat." Hall-Baker Grain Co. v. United States (1912) 117 C. C. A. 318, 198 Fed. 614.

Statements as to curative effect of drug or medicine.

False and misleading statements on the label on a drug or medicine as to its curative or remedial effects, which do not, however, import any statement concerning identity, do not constitute misbranding within the meaning of § 8 of the Federal food and drugs act of June 30, 1906, as such statements are beyond the scope and purpose of the act, which defines the term "misbranded" as applicable to all drugs or articles of food, the package or label of which shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding such article or the ingredients or substances contained therein which shall be false or misleading in any particular. United States v. Johnson (1911) 221 U. S. 488, 55 L. ed. 823, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 627, affirming (1910) 177 Fed. 313; United States v. American Druggists' Syndicate (1911) 186 Fed. 387.

But under the Sherley amendment of 1912 to the Federal food and drugs act of 1906, statements as to the curative properties of a drug or medicine constitute misbranding if they are both false in fact and fraudulently made, but not if made in good faith as an honest expression of opinion; and the question of fact as to the fraudulent character of the statement is one which must be determined by the jury. United States v. American Laboratories (1915) 222 Fed. 104.

Place of statements.

The word "package," or its equivalent expression, as used in the section of the Federal pure food and drugs act of June 30, 1906, defining what shall constitute misbranding within the meaning of the act, refers to the immediate container of the article which is intended for consumption by the public, and not simply to the outside wrapping or box containing the packages made up and intended for sale to the ultimate consumer. McDermott v. Wisconsin (1913) 228 U. S. 115, 57 L. ed. 754, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 984, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 39, reversing (1910) 143 Wis. 18, 126 N. W. 888, 21 Ann. Cas. 1315.

And, accordingly, in a prosecution under the Federal pure food and drugs act for shipping misbranded medicines in a box containing several bottles thereof, it is not necessary to allege that the box was misbranded, if it is charged that each of the bottles was misbranded. Dr. J. L. Stephens Co. v. United States (1913) 122 C. C. A. 135, 203 Fed. 817.

Under the Federal act of 1906, false and misleading statements regarding an article on an advertising circular inclosed with the article inside the carton in which it was offered for sale, did not constitute misbranding, as such a circular neither induced a sale nor deceived a prospective purchaser, and was not within the purview of the act. United States v. American Druggists' Syndicate (1911) 186 Fed. 387.

But under the amendment of 1912, false and fraudulent statements regarding curative or therapeutic effects, on circulars contained in the package, constitute misbranding. SEVEN CASES v. UNITED STATES, ante, 164.

Mere offering for sale as another article.

Under the portion of § 8 of the Federal food and drugs act, which defines misbranding as "offering an article for sale" under the distinctive name of another article, even though no label describing it as such other article be affixed to it, an article of food consisting of a compound of lemon terpene and citral is misbranded if offered for sale and sold as pure lemon oil. Weeks v. United States (1915) 139 C. C. A. 626, 224 Fed. 64.

Package containing premium or coupon as misbranded.

It is within the police power of the state to provide that a food product shall be deemed to be misbranded if there be contained in the package any gifts, premiums, or prizes. Re Arrigo (1915) 98 Neb. 134, L.R.A.—, 152 N. W. 319; Re De Klotz (1915) 98 Neb. 140, 152 N. W. 321; Re Indovina (1915) 98 Neb. 140, 152 N. W. 321.

But under the provision of the Nebraska pure food act, that a food product shall be deemed to be misbranded if there be contained in the package any gifts, premiums, or prizes, a food package is not misbranded by reason of the fact that it contains merely a narrow slip of thin paper or coupon, which does not in any way affect the wholesomeness of the food, and is practically unappreciable in weight, and which bears the printed statement: "This coupon will be accepted by us, with others, in full payment for the many beautiful and costly articles described in our handsomely illustrated catalogue upon conditions stated therein," etc.; such a slip or coupon not being distinguishable, in principle, for the purposes of this statute, from any other printed advertising matter, against the placing of which in food packages there is no prohibition. Re De Klotz (1915) 98 Neb. 861, 155 N. W. 240, setting aside, upon rehearing, the opinion reported in (1915) 98 Neb. 140, 152 N. W. 321, and affirming the judgment of the trial court. A. C. W.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

RE WILL OF MICHAEL O'CONNOR, Deceased.

HOWARD JAMES SCOTT et al., Appts., v.

MARY A. O'CONNOR COUCH.

(271 Ill. 395, 111 N. E. 272)

Will — corporation as executor — stockholder as witness.

1. A stockholder of a bank which is made executor of a will is not competent to witness its execution.

For other cases, see Wills, I. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — statutory regulations — corporation and stockholder.

2. A corporation named as executor in a will witnessed by one of its stockholders is within the operation of a statute providing that if any beneficial interest is given to a subscribing witness, such interest shall be null and void, and he shall be compelled to give testimony as to the residue of the will, and therefore the corporation is disqualified to act as executor, but the stockholder must testify as to the execution of the will.

For other cases, see Wills, I. c, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — proper attestation — adverse testimony of attesting witnesses.

3. A will containing an attesting clause properly signed, and reciting that the witnesses believed testator to be of sound mind and capable of making the will, meets the requirements of the statute, although the attesting witnesses subsequently testified that testator was not of sound mind and memory.

Evidence — capacity of testator — opinions.

4. Persons who testify to transacting business with testator and meeting him socially may give their opinions as to his soundness of mind.

A PPEAL by proponents from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County, affirming a judgment of the County Court, refusing probate of an instrument alleged to be the will of Michael O'Connor, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward Maher, R. H. C. Miller, and Sig. B. Nelson, for appellants:

Proponents of a will and codicil are not confined, on appeal to the circuit court, when they were rejected in the county court, to the testimony of attesting witnesses, and resort may be had to any legitimate evidence which may be resorted to in order to establish a will in chancery.

Mead v. Presbyterian Church, 229 Ill. 529, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 255, 82 N. E. 371, 11 Ann. Cas. 426; Kaul v. Lyman, 259 Ill. 30, 102 N. E. 179; Voodry v. University of Illinois, 251 Ill. 48, 95 N. E. 1034; Craig v. Southard, 148 Ill. 37, 35 N. E. 361.

Proponents are not bound by the testimony of attesting witnesses. They may be contradicted or impeached by proof of previous declarations, as proponents are required by law to produce the attesting witnesses.

30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 595; Thompson v. Owen, 174 Ill. 229, 45 L.R.A. 682, 51 N. E. 1046; Re Barry, 219 Ill. 391, 76 N. E. 577; Re Simon, 266 Ill. 304, 107 N. E. 613.

The testimony of the attesting witness Pankey, and of the witnesses Butt and Williamson, was competent, and it was error to exclude or strike out such testimony.

Jones v. Grieser, 238 Ill. 183, 87 N. E. 295, 15 Ann. Cas. 787; Fearn v. Postlethwaite, 240 Ill. 626, 88 N. E. 1057; Boyd v. McConnell, 209 Ill. 396, 70 N. E. 649; Standley v. Moss, 114 Ill. App. 612.

The opinion of a nonexpert witness is entitled to no weight where he states no facts on which to base a reasonable belief as to the mental condition of the testator.

Brainard v. Brainard, 259 Ill. 627, 103 N. E. 45; Craig v. Southard, 148 Ill. 37, 35 N. E. 361; Baker v. Baker, 202 Ill. 609, 67 N. E. 410; Huggins v. Drury, 192 Ill. 528, 61 N. E. 652.

The valid execution of the codicil, together with testamentary capacity at the time of its execution, carries with it and proves the will, because O'Connor's codicil refers to and makes the will a part of the codicil.

Fry v. Morrison, 159 Ill. 244, 42 N. E. 774; Ellis v. Dick, 165 Ill. 637, 46 N. E. 710; Brown v. Riggan, 94 Ill. 560; Duncan v. Duncan, 23 Ill. 364, 76 Am. Dec. 699.

The law presumes that O'Connor was sane before and at the times of the execution of the will and of the codicil.

Wilbur v. Wilbur, 129 Ill. 392, 21 N. E. 1076; Holloway v. Galloway, 51 Ill. 159; Carpenter v. Calvert, 83 Ill. 62; Baker v. Baker, 202 Ill. 595, 67 N. E. 410; Craig v. Southard, 148 Ill. 209, 44 N. E. 393.

Testimony of conduct of business transactions before and after the execution of the will and codicil is properly receivable to show testamentary capacity, such evidence being confined within reasonable limits as to time.

Voodry v. University of Illinois, 251 Ill. 48, 95 N. E. 1034; Craig v. Southard, 148 Ill. 37, 35 N. E. 361; Petefish v. Becker, 176 Ill. 448, 52 N. E. 71; Shults v. Shults, 229 Ill. 420, 82 N. E. 312.

The testimony of a subscribing witness invalidating a will ought to be received with suspicion, because such person, by his act of attestation, solemnly testifies to the sanity of the testator, and, as a matter of law, the testimony of such subscribing witness is entitled to no more weight than that of another person of equal ability and opportunities of observation.

Craig v. Southard, 148 Ill. 37, 35 N. E. 361; Brainard v. Brainard, 259 Ill. 613, 103 N. E. 45; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1015; 40 Cyc. 1309; 1 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, 2d ed. § 218; Lambert v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 61; Webb v. Dye, 18 W. Va. 376; Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt. 96; Baker v. Baker, 202 Ill. 595, 67 N. E. 410.

O'Connor had mental strength before, at, and after the making of the will, and before, at, and after the making of the codicil, to make contracts and carry on and transact ordinary business. This is more than sufficient to establish testamentary capacity.

Re Weedman, 254 Ill. 505, 98 N. E. 956; Trish v. Newell, 62 Ill. 196, 14 Am. Rep.

79; Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. 267; Greene v. Greene, 145 Ill. 264, 33 N. E. 941; Drum v. Capps, 240 Ill. 524, 88 N. E. 1020; Bevelot v. Lestrade, 153 Ill. 625, 38 N. E. 1056; Meeker v. Meeker, 75 Ill. 260.

Mental capacity is held established by proof of facts that tend to show capacity of testator to transact his ordinary business. Facts of lacking testamentary capacity must clearly preponderate to justify a setting aside of the will.

The test of competency is whether the witness will gain or lose financially, as the direct result of the suit, or whether the judgment will be evidence for or against him in another action.

Courts of equity will disregard mere matters of form and will look to the substance, and see on which side of the controversy the real interest of a party to the suit who is interested therein lies, and determine the competency of the witness from his interest in the case, regardless of the mere question of pleadings, when the question is as to his interest in the case.

Hobbs v. Saunders, 264 Ill. 52, 105 N. E. 737.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Application was made to the county court of Knox county to admit to probate an instrument alleged to be the will of Michael O'Connor, deceased. Probate was refused, and an appeal was taken by the legatees and devisees under the will to the circuit court. There was a hearing in the circuit court, at which the heirs at law contested the application, and probate was again refused, and a further appeal was taken to this court.

On January 4, 1913, Michael O'Connor executed an instrument as his last will and testament at the People's Trust & Savings Bank in Galesburg, where he had done considerable business, and he died on May 24, 1914. The attestation clause was in the usual form, containing all the statutory requirements, and it was signed by Nellie Stark and W. H. Pankey as witnesses. Nellie Stark was a stenographer and clerk in the bank, and she testified to the execution of the will, and that, in her opinion, the testator was at that time of sound mind and memory. W. H. Pankey was the other subscribing witness, and testified to the execution of the will and that at the time he regarded the testator as of sound mind and memory; but his testimony was stricken out by the court, because he was a director and stockholder of the bank, which was appointed executor of the will. The statute of wills provides that a will must be attested in the presence of the testator or testatrix by two or more credible witnesses, and that means witnesses who at the time were competent, in law, to testify concerning the subject-matter. Harp v. Parr, 168 Ill. 459, 48 N. E. 113; Johnson v. Johnson, 187 Ill. 86, 58 N. E. 237. The test of competency is whether the witness will gain or lose financially as a direct result of the establishing of the instrument as a will. O'Brien v. Bonfield, 213 Ill. 428, 72 N. E. 1090. Under that rule a person who is appointed executor by a will is incompetent to attest it as a witness because he will gain the commissions allowed by law if the will is established, and that is a direct financial gain to him, and another person who, by virtue of a contract, is to share in the fees earned by the executor, is equally incompetent. Smith v. Goodell, 258 Ill. 145, 101 N. E. 255. The test whether a witness has an interest which disqualifies him, under the act concerning evidence and depositions, to testify against an heir, devisee, or legatee, is whether he will immediately gain or lose by the event of the suit, or whether the verdict can be given in evidence for or against him in another suit. The interest must be a legal interest in the outcome of the suit, and it must be certain, direct, and immediate. Feitl v. Chicago City R. Co. 211 Ill. 279, 71 N. E. 991; Jones v. Abbott, 235 Ill. 220, 85 N. E. 279; Ackman v. Potter, 239 Ill. 578, 88 N. E. 231.

Counsel for appellants contend that under these rules Pankey was a competent witness, because his interest as a stockholder in the commissions was indirect, and not immediate, but remote and incidental, and that, while there was a possibility of a direct profit to the bank, there could be only an indirect profit to Pankey. Counsel for appellee, citing and relying upon cases holding the above rule, contend that Pankey was incompetent, because he had an interest which must be direct, legal, immediate, and certain, and would gain or lose as a result of the suit. That could only be if a beneficial interest was given to him by the terms of the will itself, since he neither had nor claimed any interest in any property disposed of by the will, and had acquired no interest, by contract or otherwise, adverse to the heir at law. The question whether a stockholder of a corporation is a competent witness to testify against the representative of a deceased person, where the corporation will gain or lose as a result of a suit, must be regarded as settled in this court, and the position of counsel for appellee must be upheld. Stockholders in a corporation are owners of the income and earnings of the corporation and directly interested therein, and as a general rule, unaffected by any special statutory provision, they are incompetent to testify for the benefit of the corporation against an heir at law, devisee, or legatee. C. H. Albers Commission Co. v. Sessel, 193 Ill. 153, 61 N. E. 1075; Anthony Ittner Brick Co. v. Ashby, 198 Ill. 562, 64 N. E. 1109; Cronin v. Supreme Council, R. L. 199 Ill. 228, 93 Am. St. Rep. 127, 65 N. E. 323. There is, however, a special statutory provision applicable to a witness attesting the execution of a will.

In the revision of 1872 (Laws 1871-72, p. 775), a provision of the Revised Statutes of 1845 was brought forward as § 8 of the statute of wills (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1913, chap. 148). It removed the incompetency of a witness to the execution of a will to whom any beneficial devise, legacy, or interest was made or given by the will, and provided that such witness should be compellable to appear and give testimony on the residue of the will in like manner as if no such devise or bequest had been made; but the devise, legacy, or interest was declared to be null and void unless the will had been duly attested by a sufficient number of witnesses exclusive of such person, saving, however, to the witness, any share of the testator's estate not exceeding the value of the devise or bequest to which the witness would have been entitled if the will was not established. That section of the statute of wills was regarded by this court as remedial, and its purpose and effect were explained, in Jones v. Grieser, 238 Ill. 183, 87 N. E. 295, 15 Ann. Cas. 787. In that case W. H. Armstrong and W. J. Sprague were the attesting witnesses of the will of Jeremiah Smith, deceased, and were also named as executors of the will. Upon an application to admit the will to probate, the county court held they were not competent as witnesses; but on appeal the circuit court decided they were competent, and admitted the will to probate, and this court affirmed the judgment. As to the remedial nature of the statute, the court said that it was passed solely with the view to prevent the destruction of a will which would otherwise be a valid will, except that the will as executed contained some provision which made its establishment according to the forms of law necessary by the calling of witnesses who took some interest under the will. Concerning the application of the section to particular witnesses, and whether their incompetency was removed by the statute, the court said: "If the incompetency of the witnesses existed outside of the fact that the will gave them a beneficial interest in the testator's estate, § 8 of the wills act does not remove the incompetency of the witnesses to the will. If, however, the incompetency of the witness arises by the act of attesting a will which gives the witness some interest in the testator's estate, the statute does apply, and under that section of the statute, while the witness cannot take under the will, nevertheless he may be called and the will established by his evidence."

The court said that a person named as executor in a will, who has signed the will as an attesting witness, clearly falls within the section, and may be required to give evidence in support of the execution of the will, with the effect, however, that he is barred from acting as executor or participating in the administration of the estate in any manner. That decision was adhered to and indorsed in Fearn v. Postlethwaite, 240 Ill. 626, 88 N. E. 1057, where it was again said that, although one named as an executor is not a competent witness to the will, he may be compelled, if his testimony is needed, to abandon his executorship and testify to the execution of the will. That case, however, involved the question of the competency of the wife of the person named as executor, and it was held that her incompetency was not removed by § 8, since nothing was given to her by the will, and, like the wife of a devisee or legatee, she was prohibited from testifying for or against the interest of her husband on grounds of public policy.

After the decision in the Fearn Case the general assembly, in 1911, amended § 8 by broadening its terms so as to include the wife or husband of any witness to whom any benefit was given by the will, and declaring that, on account of the remedial character of the section, it should be construed liberally. The section, as amended, is as follows: "If any beneficial devise, legacy or interest shall be made or given in any will, testament, or codicil to any person subscribing such will, testament or codicil, as a witness to the execution thereof, or to the wife or husband of such person, such devise, legacy or interest shall, as to such beneficiary thereof, and all persons claiming under him, be null and void, unless such will, testament or codicil be otherwise duly attested by a sufficient number of witnesses, exclusive of such person, according to this act; and he or she shall be compellable to appear and give testimony on the residue of such will, testament or codicil, in like manner, as if no such devise or bequest had been made. But if such witness or beneficiary would have been entitled to any share of the testator's estate in case the will, testament or codicil was not established, then so much of such share shall be saved to such witness or beneficiary as shall not exceed the value of the said devise or bequest made to him or her as aforesaid. This act being remedial in character shall be construed liberally, and shall apply to cases arising on wills of persons deceased, prior to the adoption of this act, but not finally adjudicated." Laws of 1911, p. 538.

Counsel for appellee take the position that the corporation itself, which was named as executor, was not one of the attesting witnesses, and hence could not be required to relinquish under the statute of wills. The claim is that, Pankey being disqualified under the act concerning evidence and depositions because he subscribed as a witness the will that gave him a beneficial interest, the statute of wills did not render him competent because the beneficial interest was not given to him, but to the corporation. He was an attesting witness to the execution of the will, and it gave him a beneficial interest because he was a stockholder of the corporation named as executor, so that he came precisely within the terms of the statute of wills. That statute provides that the interest given by the will to the attesting witness shall be null and void, and he shall be compellable to appear and give testimony on the residue of the will. The beneficial interest given to Pankey was only because his corporation was named as executor, and the only means by which the beneficial interest could be annulled would be by declaring the provision by which he acquired it null and void. The legislative will that the beneficial interest of an attesting witness shall be null and void can only be made effective as to the stockholder of a corporation by declaring null and void the provision which gives an interest to his corporation.

The court, in Jones v. Grieser, supra, having defined the classes of persons whose incompetency is removed by the statute, and confined it to witnesses to whom some beneficial interest in the testator's estate is given by the will, the distinction between such witnesses and those to whom nothing is given by the will must be kept in mind. A case involving the distinction is Smith v. Goodell, 258 Ill. 145, 101 N. E. 255, supra. In that case one of the witnesses to the will was Frank F. Butzow, who was a partner in the banking business with Warren S. Goodell and Nathan P. Goodell, who were named as executors and appointed as trustees. Butzow was not named as an executor, and the will gave no beneficial interest to him or to the partnership; but there was a private contract between him and his partners by which he was to share in their earnings as executors or in any trust capacity. He derived his interest, not by any of the provisions of the will, but by reason of his relationship with those named as executors. The question of what he might receive was a question solely between him and his partners, and was entirely without the control or cognizance of the court in which the estate was being settled. He had at the time of the attestation a present, certain interest of a pecuniary nature in the subject-matter concerning which he was called to testify, and by reason of that interest was rendered incompetent to attest the execution of the will. The contract drew into the partnership and gave to Butzow a share of the earnings of executors in no sense connected with the banking business, and not given to him, directly or indirectly, by any provision of the will. His incompetency existed outside of the fact that the will gave him any beneficial interest in the estate, and therefore his incompetency was not removed by the statute. In this case the incompetency of Pankey arose from the fact that the will gave a beneficial interest to the corporation of which he was a director and a stockholder, and the beneficial interest to the stockholders was direct, immediate, and substantial. Every dollar and every piece of property that comes to a corporation comes directly to the stockholders and increases the value of their stock. In substance, the stockholders, collectively, represented by the artificial corporate entity, were executors of the will. The interest of Pankey was derived directly from the will, and not through any private contract or arrangement outside of it, and his incompetency arose directly from the beneficial interest given to him and the other stockholders as a corporation. The statute applied, and the court erred in striking out his testimony. The bank being disqualified to act as executor, and therefore having no interest, M. O. Williamson, who was rejected as a witness, was competent to testify generally in the case.

On October 24, 1913, Michael O'Connor executed a codicil to the will in a hospital in Galesburg by which he reaffirmed the will, and if the codicil was valid the will was also rendered valid. The attesting clause to the codicil was complete as in the case of the will, containing all the particulars of the statute and that the attesting witnesses believed that the testator was of sound mind and memory and fully capable of making the instrument. It was witnessed by two nurses, Mayme Cassel and Nettie Girkin. Mayme Cassel testified that she read the attesting clause hastily, without noticing its meaning, and when asked by M. O. Williamson to sign it and have another nurse sign it, she demurred and did not want to do it, but he told her it was merely a matter of form, and she signed it. She also said that Nettie Girkin read the attesting clause, but that witness said she did not read it. Mayme Cassel testified that when the testator signed the codicil he was sitting on a chair and signed it on a chart back, while Nettie Girkin said that he was in his bed in his night robe and signed it on a bedside table. Both witnesses said he was not of sound mind and memory. Two witnesses testified that shortly before the will was offered for probate Mayme Cassel said she certainly thought the testator was of sound mind and memory, or she would not have signed the will, and a witness testified that Nettie Girkin said she thought he was of sound mind and memory. On appeal to the circuit court it was proper to establish the will by any evidence sufficient to establish a will in chancery, and a large number of witnesses, who had known the testator for many years, and had done business with him, testified that he was of sound mind and memory in 1912 and 1913. The rulings of the court in many instances unduly limited and hampered the appellants in making their proof. Witnesses who had known the testator for a great many years, had transacted business with him, met him socially, talked with him on various subjects, and visited with him in the hospital, were not permitted to give their opinion, although such opinions were admissible under the rule that witnesses who testify to facts and circumstances in their own knowledge, as coming under their observation, may give their opinion, to be received and valued according to the intelligence of the witness and his capacity to form an opinion. Roe v. Taylor, 45 Ill. 485; Snell v. Weldon, 239 Ill. 279, 87 N. E. 1022; Graham v. Deuteraman, 244 Ill. 124, 91 N. E. 61. The testator had been extensively engaged in business for many years and with many different persons as a dealer in live stock and otherwise, and from January 5, 1912, to July 29, 1913, he gave in the course of his business 100 checks on the People's Trust & Savings Bank, which were paid by the bank and produced on the trial. The contestant introduced no evidence whatever on the subject of testamentary capacity, but was content to rest upon the proposition that W. H. Pankey was an incompetent witness and the opinion of the two nurses that the testator was not of sound mind and memory. The will and codicil were attested in the manner required by the statute, and the court erred in holding the contrary.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Petition for rehearing denied February 3, 1916.

Annotation—Wills: competency, as an attesting witness, of officer or stockholder of a corporation named as executor or trustee.

The doctrine that an executor is an incompetent attesting witness to a will is established in Illinois. Jones v. Griesser (1909) 238 Ill. 183, 87 N. E. 295, 15 Ann. Cas. 787. Likewise, the wife of an executor is incompetent (Fearn v. Postlethwaite (1909) 240 Ill. 626, 88 N. E. 1057), as is also a partner of an executor, where he shares in the fees (Smith v. Goodell (1913) 258 Ill. 145, 101 N. E. 255). This incompetency of the executor is held to exist in the case of a stockholder in a corporation which is appointed as executor, in Re O'Connor, ante, 179. The view thus taken by the Illinois court is sustained in Palethorp's Estate (1915) 249 Pa. 389, 94 Atl. 1060, a case involving a stockholder in a corporation which was appointed trustee in a will. In this case the trustee was held disqualified because given broad powers with reference to the trusteeship; in fact, with the absolute power of control and administration, subject only to the directions of the testator as to specific bequests for charitable uses to certain named beneficiaries. After holding the corporation disqualified, the court states that if the interest of the corporation is a disqualifying one, it would seem to follow necessarily that the interest of a stockholder must be so regarded, since the stockholders own and control the corporation, and whatever benefits accrue to the corporate body inure to the stockholders in dividends; that, in determining what constitutes a disqualifying interest of an attesting witness to a will, a corporation as a legal entity cannot be differentiated from its shareholders, who are the real owners of the corporate property, who control and direct its business affairs, and are responsible for those in charge of its management.

Both the assistant trust officer and the title officer of a trust company are disinterested witnesses to a will containing a gift to the trust company in trust. Carson's Estate (1914) 244 Pa. 401, 90 Atl. 719. The fact that the stockholder in Palethorp's Estate (Pa.) supra, was an assistant to the trust officer is there stated not to render him incompetent.

It is apparent that to present a distinctive point to the question under annotation it must be assumed that an executor or trustee is an incompetent witness to a will. It is held in some cases that an executor or trustee is a competent witness to the will. After holding this in the case of a corporate executor or trustee, it is assumed without discussion that a stockholder is likewise a competent witness. While this point is beyond the scope of the present note, a few cases so holding have been included. Re Lecarpentier (1914) — Del. —, 91 Atl. 204, holding that a stockholder and director of a trust company which was one of the executors and trustee of a will is a competent witness. Jeanes's Estate (1910) 228 Pa. 537, 77 Atl. 824, holding that a stockholder and vice president of a company which is made executor of a will is a disinterested witness within the meaning of a statute requiring disinterested witnesses to a will containing religious or charitable bequests, and this although his company would receive commissions as one of the executors.

In Jeanes's Estate (Pa.) supra, the corporation was also appointed trustee. The will contained a direction to the trustees to pay dividends on certain stock to a hospital provided it would accept a conditional bequest. For a subsequent breach of the condition, the stock was given directly to a named charity. It was contended that the stockholder in the trustee corporation was disqualified because of the compensation which might be paid to it. It is stated in answer to this contention that if, under the direction of the will to pay the dividends to the hospital, the company would charge and be entitled to receive compensation for paying them, it would be compensation for services rendered; that a stockholder could not be regarded as an interested witness because he might have an uncertain, remote, and contingent interest in a very small sum in the earnings of the company under the direction of the testatrix that, upon certain conditions, the company pay dividends on certain shares of stock to her appointees. Accordingly the stockholder, who was also vice president of the company, was held a disinterested witness.

A statutory provision that no person having a direct legal interest in the result of any civil action or proceeding when the adverse party is the representative of a deceased person shall be permitted to testify to any transaction or conversation had between the deceased person and the witness does not render incompetent as an attesting witness one who is a stockholder in and president of a corporation named as trustee in the will. Re Wiese (1915) 98 Neb. 463, L.R.A.1915E, 832, 153 N. W. 556.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

W. O. ROGERS, Appt.,

v.

FANCY FARM TELEPHONE COMPANY.

(160 Ky. 841, 170 S. W. 178.)

Damages — death — loss of consortium.

A man cannot recover from a telephone company which negligently fails to furnish him service to summon a physician for his wife, who dies because of absence of medical aid, damages for loss of services and consortium, where the time elapsing between the negligence and the death was not appreciable.

For other cases, see Damages, III. § 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(November 12, 1914.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Graves County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged negligent failure of defendant to furnish plaintiff with telephone service. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hester & Hester for appellant.

Messrs. Stanfield & Stanfield for appellee.

Hannah, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. O. Rogers instituted this action in the Graves circuit court against the Fancy Farm Telephone Company, seeking a recovery of damages in the sum of $5,000, for alleged negligence of the defendant company in failing to afford the plaintiff telephone connection with a physician, whom plaintiff desired to call to the bedside of his wife on the occasion of her accouchement, by reason of which alleged failure the physician, although a messenger was sent for him, was unable to reach plaintiff's home, a distance of 4 miles, until it was too late to check the hemorrhages from which plaintiff's wife suffered in time to save her life.

In part, the language of the petition is as follows: "Plaintiff states that his wife was thirty-two years old, and they had four other children, all of whom were young and needed her attention to aid and assist plaintiff in caring for and rearing them, and that he was entitled to her comfort, her counsel, her services, and her company and consortium, all of which he has been deprived of by reason of defendant's negligence in failing to have and to keep its said line in repair and working order, and by reason of all of which he has sustained damages in the sum of $5,000."

The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the petition as amended, and the plaintiff declined to plead further, his petition was dismissed, and he appeals.

We deem it necessary to consider but one question raised by the appeal: Can the husband recover for loss of services and society of the wife, sustained by her death? as it is this loss alone which is sued for.

1. In Eden v. Lexington & F. R. Co. 14 B. Mon. 208, the court said: "The injury complained of in this case is the loss of the society of the wife and of her assistance in the management of the husband's domestic affairs. According to the existing law, there can be no recovery for this injury, inasmuch as the death of the wife was instantaneous, and it is only for the loss that is sustained by the husband in this respect from the moment of the injury up to the time of the death of the wife for which any recovery can be had."

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McElwain, 98 Ky. 700, 34 L.R.A. 788, 56 Am. St. Rep. 385, 34 S. W. 236, the court said that it was perfectly manifest that at common law a husband could recover damages for the loss of his wife's society from the date of the injury until her death, resulting from a negligent act, although she died as a result thereof, provided any appreciable length of time elapsed after the negligent act became operative until her death, during which time the husband could have enjoyed his wife's society.

It is apparent from the language of the petition above quoted that plaintiff sues for the loss of conjugal society after the death of his wife,—i. e., caused by and resulting from the death of his wife; and under the decisions in the Eden and McElwain Cases he cannot recover therefor. There was no appreciable length of time after the alleged negligence became operative and before the death of plaintiff's wife. The trial court, therefore, properly sustained the demurrer.

2. It is unnecessary to consider whether the alleged negligence was too remote to constitute the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's wife.

Judgment affirmed.

Annotation—Loss of consortium as element of damage for wrongful death.

In general.

As shown in the notes appended to Blair v. Seitner Dry Goods Co. L.R.A. 1915D, 524, and Marri v. Stamford Street R. Co. 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1042, a husband is entitled to recover damages for loss of consortium due to the personal injury of his wife, but the right of a wife to recover for the loss of consortium due to an injury to her husband is not so clear. See note appended to Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024.

In treating the question as to the right of one of the parties to the marital relation to recover for the loss of consortium due to the negligent killing of the other party, the term "consortium" is used in the sense of conjugal society, affection, aid, assistance, company, and companionship. There is considerable conflict and confusion among the cases as to the right to include certain of these elements of loss in the recovery by one spouse of damages for the wrongful killing of the other.

The conflict on the subject is in part due to the fact that the right to recover damages for the negligent killing of the husband or wife is statutory, the statutes giving the right are not uniform in language, and the difference is frequently substantial. Generally, however, the statutes in effect authorize the recovery of the pecuniary loss to the survivor from the death of the other party to the marital relation; but the term "pecuniary loss" is very apt to be construed with reference to the general context of the statute, and where the language indicates an intention to limit the recovery, the term "pecuniary" is more strictly construed than it is when an intention is indicated to give to the term a broad and liberal construction.

It is of interest to note that generally this difference among the courts as to the measure of damages to be awarded to one spouse for the death of the other has apparently made but little difference in the amount of the verdicts rendered, and the distinction is seldom traceable in the amount of the pecuniary loss actually assessed in concrete cases in the different jurisdictions. Indeed, the most extravagant verdicts are to be found in jurisdictions which deny the right to recover compensation for loss of conjugal society and companionship. A comparison of the cases in this regard may be had by referring to the note which collects the cases on excessive and inadequate damages.*

It is intended to confine this note to those elements of damage included in the term "consortium" which are more intangible in their character, and form a more indefinite basis for estimating the pecuniary loss than does such pecuniary damage as loss of support. It may be proper to observe in this connection, however, that many of the cases sustaining the right to recover for loss of services, earnings, or support are authority for the rule that the more intangible benefits of the marital relation cannot be considered in assessing damages to one spouse for the unlawful killing of the other. These cases are not included herein, but may be found in the note to be appended to Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, L.R.A.—, —.

Without pointing out what was meant by the term "consortium," it has been denied that any recovery may be had under a statute embodying the principles of Lord Campbell's act, as compensation for loss of consortium.<sup>1</sup> And, referring specifically to Lord Campbell's act, it has been held that the framers of this act never could have meant to give compensation to a widow merely for the deprivation of her husband.<sup>2</sup> On the other hand, * Note appended to St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Craft, L.R.A.1916C, 817.

<sup>2</sup> In Gillard v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. (1849) 12 L. T. (Eng.) 356, Pollock Ch. B., says that it is a pure question of pecuniary compensation and nothing more which is contemplated by the act commonly designated as Lord Campbell's act, for it is utterly impossible for a jury to estimate any sum as a compensation for the injured feelings of the survivors. All that is left that is appreciable after the death of the party killed is the pecuniary loss sustained by his family; and this act enables them to

in assessing the damage to the widow it has been asserted that there is to be considered the probability of the continuance of the domestic relations as they existed at the time of the husband's death, and the continuance of his care, protection, and support.<sup>3</sup> Under the Connecticut statute, which differs somewhat in immaterial respects on this point from Lord Campbell's act, it has been held that the amount recoverable is influenced by the obligations, moral or legal, naturally incident to the marital relation, and the extent to which the deceased recognized these obligations.<sup>4</sup>

And where the question has been specifically presented and urged, it has been held that every husband has a pecuniary value to his wife beyond the amount of his earnings or vocation,<sup>5</sup> and that, even as a pecuniary proposition, a man's life is worth something more to his family than the mere amount of money which he brings into it.<sup>6</sup> And so as to a wife, it has been declared that the pecuniary value of her services as wife and mother are not truly indicated by the consideration of the question as to the wages to be paid to a servant girl or housekeeper.<sup>7</sup>

These general statements, however, are of but little aid in determining what elements of consortium aside from loss of support, services, or earnings may be included in assessing the damages to the husband or wife for the death of the other. As already pointed out, the recovery of other elements of consortium arising out of the marital relation has been questioned because of their intangible character, the courts differing as to their own ability or the ability of the jury to assess damages for such losses by the application of any pecuniary standard.

Elements of loss of intangible character.

In many jurisdictions the rule obtains that elements of benefit or advantage inuring to the parties to the marital relation, such as conjugal society,<sup>8</sup> companrecover that which deceased himself would have sued for had the accident not terminated fatally. The framers of the acts never could have meant to give compensation to the parent for the mere deprivation of a son, or to the widow for that of her husband.

<sup>4</sup> Farley v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1913) 87 Conn. 328, 87 Atl. 990, holding, where the damages recoverable for a wrongful death are exclusively for the benefit of certain designated beneficiaries, the amount recoverable in a given case is influenced by the nature of the relation between the beneficiaries and the deceased, the obligations, moral or legal, naturally incident to such relation, the extent to which the deceased recognized that obligation, his financial ability and disposition to do so, as shown by experience, and the thousand and one circumstances calculated to throw light in some substantial way upon the reasonable expectation of benefits of which the beneficiaries were deprived by the death. This rule must differ according to the relation between the parties plaintiff and the decedent, according as the action is brought for the benefit of the husband, wife, minor child, or parent of minor child, for the loss of services or support to which the beneficiary was legally entitled, or is brought for the benefit of a person whose damages consist only in the loss of a prospective benefit to which he was not legally entitled.

ionship,<sup>9</sup> comfort,<sup>10</sup> association,<sup>11</sup> love and affection,<sup>12</sup> or protection<sup>13</sup> are so intangible in their character as to render it impossible to measure their value by any pecuniary standard, and that hence, in assessing the pecuniary loss to one spouse for the wrongful or negligent killing of the other, these elements are not to be considered by the jury. As to the loss of society, the great weight of authority supports this view; but, as hereafter pointed out, there is more doubt as to the weight of authority with reference to the other elements of loss mentioned.

The doctrine that loss of society and companionship cannot be considered in assessing the damage to the survivor of the marital relation has been based upon the reasoning that the pecuniary loss or damage must be such as can be measured by some standard. That it is a term employed judicially, not only to express the character of the loss to the beneficiary which is the foundation of recovery, but

On appeal this case was reversed on the ground that the right to recover for loss of society of the wife did not survive the death of the husband. (1881) 83 N. Y. 595, 38 Am. Rep. 474. In this connection attention is called to Green v. Hudson River R. Co. (1866) 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 277, which is sometimes cited as holding that a husband cannot maintain an action for damages by being deprived of the society and assistance of his wife, resulting from her death. This case, however, actually holds that a statute authorizing an action for negligent death for the benefit of the wife and next of kin does not authorize an action by the husband to recover for the negligent killing of his wife, without reference to the nature of the pecuniary loss, whether the loss of society, companionship, or the services of the wife.

the death of her husband, there may also be included loss of his services in assisting her in the care of the family.<sup>20</sup> Also the personal attentions of the husband to secure the comfort of the wife in the many ways in which he may make himself helpful and useful to her are to be taken into consideration in assessing her loss by reason of his death, although there is no reliable standard for the measurement of such damages;<sup>21</sup> and the disposition of the husband, and his deportment towards his wife and family, his counsel, advice, care and solicitude for their welfare,<sup>22</sup> and the loss of family resources,<sup>23</sup> may also be considered in estimating the damages for his death.

And while denying the right to recover, at least, for loss of society, nevertheless it has been held that damages are recoverable for loss from being deprived of the comfort of the decedent's experience, knowledge, and judgment in the management of the affairs of the family;<sup>24</sup> and that the jury may take into consideration the loss of the decedent's services in the superintendence, attention to, and care of his family;<sup>25</sup> and also the father's constant, daily services to his family, his attention and care in their behalf, in the relation which he sustained to them.<sup>26</sup> It has, however, been held that the jury are not entitled to take into consideration the loss of social relations of husband and wife, and advice and protection of the deceased as wife and mother.<sup>27</sup>

While it has been asserted that a widow may recover for loss of the support and protection of her husband, in specifically applying the rule in Wisconsin the basis for assessing the damage has apparently been support based upon the earning capacity of the deceased, for it has been held that the recovery should be limited to such sum as, being put at interest, will each year, by taking part of the principal and adding to the interest, yield an amount sufficient for the support of the widow during the time the deceased would probably have lived, together with such other sum as the evidence shows there was a reasonable expectation that the widow would have received from the decedent's earnings.<sup>28</sup>

Since the cases sustaining the right to recover for what may be termed the intangible elements of loss to a husband or wife from the death of the other proceed upon the ground that these elements are subject to pecuniary estimate, in principle they are opposed to the other class of cases denying, either in whole or in part, the right to recover for these different elements of loss. As pointed out, however, in some of the cases a distinction may be made between the language of the statutes authorizing the action; but this is not true as to all of the cases, and, as noted, in some jurisdictions the right to recover for loss of society is denied, yet the right is sustained to recover for other elements arising from loss of consortium which are intangible, and but little, if any, more subject to pecuniary estimate than is the loss of the society of the deceased.<sup>29</sup>

It is well settled, however, that, in assessing the damages for these intangible elements of loss, the basis of the assessment is pecuniary; and it is only the pecuniary value that is to be considered.<sup>30</sup> But it is held that these elements are capable of being considered from a pecuniary standard; for example, the pecuniary loss to the wife of a kind husband, aside from loss of support, may be considerable, for she loses his advice and assistance in many matters of domestic economy.<sup>31</sup>

Gasolene — testing and branding.

1. The prevention of fraud and imposition upon the purchasing public in the sale of a commodity the quality of which is not readily ascertainable is a proper object of police regulation as well as the protection of public safety; and Laws 1909, chap. 502, providing for the testing of gasolene for gravity, requiring it to be branded, "unsafe for illuminating purposes," and requiring the word "gasolene" to be branded and the gravity stenciled on every barrel or package,—is a proper police measure, and is not in contravention of the Constitution.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying a motion for a new trial of an action brought to recover inspection fees for inspecting oil and gasoline of defendant in accordance with statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Martin H. Albin and Frederick M. Catlin, for appellant:

The fees provided by chapter 502, Laws of 1909, for inspection of oil and gasoline, are excessive, and produce a revenue, in amount, far beyond what is necessary to execute the law, and constitute a burden upon interstate commerce, and are in conflict with the Constitution of the United States; and the law is therefore void.

Dibell, C., filed the following opinion:

Action by the state to recover inspection fees for inspecting oil and gasoline in accordance with Laws 1909, chap. 502, now embodied in Gen. Stat. 1913, §§ 3619-3632. There were findings for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

1. Particular objection is made to § 7 of the act (Gen. Stat. 1913, § 3625) upon the ground that the inspection which it provides for gasoline is not a legitimate police regulation. This section provides that gasoline shall be tested as to gravity, and branded "Unsafe for illuminating purposes;" and that every barrel or package containing gasoline shall be branded with the word "gasoline" in red letters and the gravity stenciled thereon. No test other than for gravity is provided. The objection is that this test has no legitimate reference to public safety. The prevention of fraud and imposition upon the purchasing public in the sale of a commodity the quality of which is not readily ascertainable by the general public is properly enough the subject of police regulation. In an early case the purpose of inspection laws is stated as follows: "The object of those laws is to protect community, so far as they apply to domestic sales, from frauds and impositions; and, in relation to articles designed for exportation, to preserve the character and reputation of the state in foreign markets." Clintaman v. Northrop, 8 Cow. 45.

In Patapsco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 171 U. S. 345, 43 L. ed. 191, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862, the court, in holding that a statute providing for the inspection of commercial fertilizers was valid when enacted in the exercise of the police power, said: "No doubt can be entertained of this where the inspection is manifestly intended, and calculated in good faith, to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety. . . . And it has now been determined that this is so, if the object of the inspection is the prevention of imposition on the public generally."

There is a discussion of the subject in Freund, Pol. Power, §§ 272 et seq. We do not conceive that there is any considerable doubt of the propriety of legislation under the police power having as its object the prevention of fraud and imposition upon the purchasing public. The statute requiring inspection as to gravity as a condition of sale within the state impairs no fundamental or constitutional right of the vender. We do not say that the legislature may not, with propriety, have considered that there was an element of public safety to be guarded by the statute; but, conceding that this is not so, the statute is easily upheld as a measure intended to prevent imposition upon the purchasing public.

2. It is claimed that the oil and gasoline inspected were the subject of interstate commerce, and that the inspection was an unlawful interference with such commerce within the commerce clause of the Constitution. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8. The defendant is a Minnesota corporation. It has its place of business in St. Paul. It has storage facilities at West St. Paul and at White Bear. It has no other place of business. Oil products are shipped to it from the oil-producing states in tank cars and are stored in its storage tanks. They are not "original package" shipments. Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 56 L. ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715. They are on the defendant's private property, leased or owned, and the cars are switched there and unloaded. The railroads make and the defendant accepts delivery there. The oil and gasoline have no further definite destination. They are for sale. They are incorporated into the general mass of property of the state. Most of such products are sold in Minnesota. Some are sold in other states. When shipped out of the state the inspection charges are rebated, —not because the products shipped are the subject of interstate commerce, but because the state does not impose its inspection for the protection of the public of another state. The oil and gasoline are mixed by the defendant with other oil and gasoline of like quality in the storage tanks. There are no reshipments in the tank cars. Very clearly it is the purpose of the statute to impose an inspection only upon oil products coming into the state and sold to the public. The inspection is imposed for the protection of those to whom the dealer makes sales. It is not for his protection in purchasing from the refineries. The facts in the case of General Oil Co. v. Crain, 209 U. S. 211, 52 L. ed. 754, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475, involving a state oil inspection, where it was held that oil at rest in the state, though intended for shipment out of it, was not the subject of interstate commerce, are very much stronger in support of a claim that the property was the subject of interstate commerce than are the facts in the case at bar. Upon this general question, see Susquehanna Coal Co. v. South Amboy, 228 U. S. 665, 57 L. ed. 1015, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 712; Bacon v. Illinois, 227 U. S. 504, 57 L. ed. 615, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 299; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Iowa, 233 U. S. 334, 58 L. ed. 988, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592. The defendant relies particularly upon D. E. Foote & Co. v. Stanley, 232 U. S. 494, 58 L. ed. 698, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 377, and Bartels Northern Oil Co. v. Jackman, 29 N. D. 236, 150 N. W. 576, and Castle v. Mason, 91 Ohio St. 296, 110 N. E. 463, which were decided in reliance upon it. The Foote Case does not overrule the Crain Case. On the contrary, the Crain Case is followed in later cases and the doctrine of it is distinctly approved. We are of the opinion that the inspection for which recovery was had was not an inspection of property the subject of interstate commerce.

3. But if we are mistaken, and if the oil products were the subject of interstate commerce, they were subject to inspection under a statute passed in the proper exercise of the police power, though such inspection incidentally affected, if it did not unduly burden, interstate commerce. Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 56 L. ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715; New Mexico ex rel. McLean v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 203 U. S.

38, 51 L. ed. 78, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Patapasco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 171 U. S. 345, 43 L. ed. 191, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862. And whether the subject of interstate commerce, or a part of the common property of the state, the inspection charge must be reasonable. It must have reference to the cost of service. It cannot be a revenue measure clothed in the guise of an inspection law whether it relates to a subject of interstate commerce or intrastate commerce. Within reasonable limits the amount of the inspection fee is for the legislature. Willis v. Standard Oil Co. 60 Minn. 299, 52 N. W. 652. The amount of the inspection charge is primarily with the legislature, and a statute will not be held unconstitutional as providing for an excessive charge unless it is so unreasonable and disproportionate to the service rendered as to attack the good faith of the law. "The law being otherwise valid, the amount of the inspection fee is not a judicial question; it rests with the legislature to fix the amount, and it can only present a valid objection when it is shown that it is so unreasonable and disproportionate to the services rendered as to attack the good faith of the law." New Mexico ex rel. McLean v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 203 U. S. 38, 51 L. ed. 78, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1. But if it clearly appears that it is obviously and largely beyond what is necessary to pay the cost of inspection service, the law will be declared invalid. "If, therefore, it is shown that the fees are disproportionate to the service rendered, or that they include the cost of something beyond legitimate inspection to determine quality and condition, the tax must be declared void, because such costs by necessary operation obstruct the freedom of commerce among the states." D. E. Foote & Co. v. Stanley, 232 U. S. 494, 58 L. ed. 698, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 377. In the Foote Case the expenses for the two years shown amounted to 34 and 35 per cent of the inspection receipts. In the North Dakota case the expenses for five years ran from 11 to 20 per cent of the receipts, and averaged 16 per cent. In the Ohio case for a period of six years the expenses ran from 32 to 42 per cent of the receipts and averaged 37 per cent. In Minnesota, from 1903 to 1913, inclusive, a period of eleven years, the expenses fluctuating from time to time have run from 53 to 98 per cent of the receipts, and have averaged 82 per cent. These expenses cover the actual expenses of the oil-inspection department, with no allowance for incidental services rendered by the other departments of the state. In D. E. Foote & Co. v. Stanley, supra, and in Red "C" Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 222 U. S. 380, 393, 56 L. ed. 240, 244, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 152, it was said that the courts do not interfere immediately upon it being made to appear that the amount collected is beyond what is needed for inspection expenses, because of the presumption that the legislature will reduce the fees to a proper amount. The legislature, from time to time, has made a reduction in the inspection charges. It is proper to note that the last legislature (Laws 1915, chap. 271) reduced the inspection charges on oil and gasoline in tanks or tank cars containing more than 50 barrels, and we take it that such oil products reach the state largely in tank cars, to 7 cents per barrel, it before having been 10 cents. This reduction of 30 per cent is substantial, and, unless there is a material increase in consumption, will greatly reduce receipts.

While we are impressed with the view that in years past the inspection fees have been higher than necessary to meet the expenses of an economical inspection, we cannot say, under the rules fixed for our guidance, that the statute is invalid. The increase in consumption has been great, and it was perhaps not easy to foresee the receipts which would come from year to year. The legislature of 1915 made a good-faith endeavor by a reduction of 30 per cent to bring about a proper relation between receipts and inspection fees.

4. Counsel refer to U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10, cl. 2, providing that no state, without the consent of Congress, shall lay any duties on imports except such as are necessary for executing its inspection laws. This constitutional provision refers to imports from foreign countries, and not to property coming from another state. American Steel & Wire Co. v. Speed, 192 U. S. 500, 48 L. ed. 538, 24 Sup. Ct. #### Validity in general.

The validity of proper state inspection laws applying to articles of interstate commerce is recognized by the Constitution of the United States, which provides: "No state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imports laid by any state on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress." Article I., § 10, subdiv. 2.

The term "imposts" as used in the above clause refers to goods from foreign countries, not those passing from one state to another. New Mexico ex rel. McLean v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1906) 203 U. S. 38, 51 L. ed. 78, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Pittsburg & S. Coal Co. v. Louisiana (1894) 156 U. S. 590, 39 L. ed. 544, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 18, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459, (1889) 41 La. Ann. 465, 6 So. 220; State v. Bartles Oil Co. ante, 193; State v. Bixman (1901) 162 Mo. 1, 62 S. W. 828.

When inspection statutes provide for actual inspection, and do not impose excessive fees for the inspection service, they are uniformly upheld.

Thus in Turner v. Maryland (1882) 107 U. S. 38, 27 L. ed. 370, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44, a statute of Maryland providing that it shall not be lawful to carry out of the state in hogsheads any tobacco raised in the state, except in hogsheads which shall have been inspected, passed, and marked according to the provisions of the act, was held to be a proper inspection law, and not in conflict with the Federal Constitution; it appearing that the charges made were for services rendered in the inspection.

A statute providing for the appointment of two gaugers of coal and coke boats is not a regulation of commerce, nor does it lay an impost or duty on imports or exports from other states. Pittsburg & S. Coal Co. v. Louisiana (1894) 156 U. S. 590, 39 L. ed. 544, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 18, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459.

A statutory prohibition of the receipt by common carriers for transportation beyond the limits of the territory, of hides which do not bear evidence of inspection required by the act, is a valid exercise of the police power, and does not, in the absence of congressional legislation covering the subject, violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, although hides not offered for transportation are not required to be inspected, and although the incidental effect of the statute may be to levy a tax upon that class of property. New Mexico ex rel. McLean v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1906) 203 U. S. 38, 51 L. ed. 78, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, affirming (1904) 12 N. M. 425, 78 Pac. 74, 79 Pac. 295.

A statutory prohibition against sales by importing purchasers of concentrated commercial feeding stuffs in the original packages, unless there has been a compliance with the statute as to inspection, analysis, and disclosure of the ingredients, together with the incidental provisions for the filing of a certificate for registration and for labels and stamps, is a proper exercise of the police power of the state, and not an unconstitutional regulation of commerce. Savage v. Jones (1912) 225 U. S. 501, 56 L. ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715; Standard Stock Food Co. v. Wright (1912) 225 U. S. 540, 56 L. ed. 1197, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784.

A statute subjecting illuminating oils sold or offered for sale in a state to inspection, for the purpose of determining the safety and value of such oils for illuminating purposes, is a proper exercise of the police power, and does not violate the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Red "C" Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board of Agriculture (1912) 222 U. S. 380, 56 L. ed. 240, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 152, affirming (1909) 172 Fed. 695.

A statute providing for the inspection of all cotton-seed meal, cotton-seed cake, linseed-oil meal, linseed-oil cake, and feeding stuff, by-products of starch factories, glucose, cereal, and breakfast-food factories, breweries, distilleries, meat-packing establishments and slaughter houses, sold or offered for sale in the state, and making a level charge of 25 cents per ton on all such products without discrimination as to value of the product, and providing for an actual inspection of such products, is valid as an inspection law. George H. Lee Co. v. Webster (1911) 190 Fed. 353.

A state statute which requires inspectors to examine and inspect all hides or animals known or reported to him as sold or as leaving or going out of the county for sale or shipment, and all animals driven or sold in the district for slaughter, and requiring him to prevent the sale or removal out of the county of hides or animals upon which the brands cannot be ascertained unless identified by proof, and providing for fees for the inspection, is an inspection law within the legislative power of the state. Neilson v. Garza (1876) 2 Woods, 287, Fed. Cas. No. 10,091.

In Green v. Savannah (1832) R. M. Charl't. (Ga.) 368, an inspection law providing for the gauging and inspecting of liquors, and for the payment of a small fee to the officer for the service performed, was held to be valid as applied to liquors imported from another state.

A statute passed for the protection of farmers, by requiring that a sample of all fertilizer sold within the state at a price over $10 per ton should be submitted to the experimental station of the agricultural college for analysis and labeling, for which a fee was charged, was not a levy of an impost on interstate commerce, where the fees were used for the single purpose of supporting and maintaining the experimental station. Vanmeter v. Spurrier (1893) 94 Ky. 22, 21 S. W. 337.

A statute providing for the inspection of hay to protect citizens of the state from unfit products does not amount to a regulation of commerce between the states nor to an impost or duty on imports or exports. Hay Inspectors v. Pleasants (1871) 23 La. Ann. 349.

A statute providing for the appointment of gaugers of cargoes of coal or coke, the charges for such gauging going exclusively to the gaugers or inspectors as their fees for services rendered in the inspection, is not a regulation of commerce in any sense of the word, as all that it purports to do is to protect buyers of coal in boats and barges against fraud in weights and measures. State v. Pittsburg & S. Coal Co. (1889) 41 La. Ann. 465, 6 So. 220.

And a city ordinance requiring the measurement of coal by an inspector when sold within the city, and providing for a small fee for his services, is not invalid as a regulation of commerce. L.R.A.1916D.

But in Foster v. Master & Wardens (1876) 94 U. S. 246, 24 L. ed. 122, reversing (1874) 26 La. Ann. 105, a statute of the state of Louisiana providing for a survey by the master and wardens of the port of New Orleans of the hatches of all sea-going vessels which should arrive at the port, or for their making a survey of damaged goods coming on board such vessels, and prohibiting any other persons from making such surveys, was held to be in violation of the Constitution, it being a regulation of both foreign and interstate commerce, and not an inspection law in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution; the purpose of the act being to furnish official evidence for the parties immediately concerned, and, where the goods are damaged, to provide for and regulate their sale.

Nature of inspection; discrimination.

To be valid as an inspection law, a statute must provide for actual inspection.

So, a requirement that a sample shall be sent in advance for inspection before intoxicating liquors are brought into the state cannot be supported as an inspection law, as such a law must at least provide for some inspection of the article imported. Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. (1898) 170 U. S. 438, 42 L. ed. 1100, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674; State v. McGee (1899) 55 S. C. 247, 74 Am. St. Rep. 741, 33 S. E. 353.

A statute forbidding any common carrier to bring into the state any intoxicating liquors from any other state or territory without first having a certificate that such liquors were consigned to a person authorized to sell the same is neither an inspection law, nor a quarantine or sanitary law, and is not a legitimate exercise of police power by the state, and is void as a regulation of commerce among the states. Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1888) 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, 1062.

A fee imposed for the registering of every brand of concentrated feeding stuff offered or held for sale or sold within the state, the registration being made, not from an examination of the goods themselves or of a sample of the goods, but from a statement as to their ingredients and from whence obtained, is not an inspection fee, but a tax on the right to engage in the business of selling such products in the state, and is therefore unconstitutional and void. George H. Lee Co. v. Webster (1911) 190 Fed. 353.

A statute which prohibits the manufacture, sale, or possession of, or the paying of freight or express charges on, intoxicating liquors, except when they are bought from a state officer authorized to sell the same and have been tested by the chemists of the South Carolina College and found to be chemically pure, but which does not require the chemist to test any liquors except those purchased by state officers for sale in the state, and fixes no fee for his services, is not a proper inspection law, but rather an effort under the guise of an inspection law to impose a burden on commerce, and is in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. Donald v. Scott (1896) 74 Fed. 859.

And an inspection law will not be upheld if it has the effect of discriminating against the products of other states.

So, a state statute compelling the inspection of all flour brought into the state and offered for sale therein and the payment of a fee for such inspection, flour made and sold in that state not being required to be inspected, is unconstitutional and void as discriminating against the products and industries of other states. Voight v. Wright (1891) 141 U. S. 62, 35 L. ed. 638, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 855.

And a statute providing for the inspection of lime, which applies only to lime brought from a certain other state, is not a proper inspection law, because it is not uniform and violates the provision of the Federal Constitution that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over those of another." Higgins v. Lime (1880) 130 Mass. 1.

A municipal ordinance requiring that all live stock shall be inspected on the hoof by an officer appointed by the town authorities before being slaughtered, as a condition to the sale for food purposes of the meat of such animals, contravenes the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution in that it practically excludes all meats taken from animals slaughtered in other states. Carter v. Green (1910) 127 La: 490, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1055, 53 So. 729. For other cases of this nature, see the last paragraph of the note to Evans v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 278.

police power of the territory, although some oils may be excluded which are as safe for use as those which comply with the statutory standard. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Deselms (1909) 212 U. S. 159, 53 L. ed. 453, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 270, affirming (1907) 18 Okla. 107, 89 Pac. 212.

To what commodities applicable.

Interstate as well as foreign commerce is subject to state inspection laws. Patapasco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture (1898) 171 U. S. 345, 43 L. ed. 191, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862.

Inspection laws are valid when they act on a subject before it becomes an article of commerce, and also, although operating on articles brought from one state into another, when they are enacted in the exercise of that power of self-protection commonly called the police power. (U. S.) Ibid.

So important a matter as fixing the grade by which grain in interstate transportation can be sold, and without which it cannot be sold on any large scale, admits of one uniform system or plan of regulation, and only one, and therefore falls within the exclusive power of Congress; and statutes passed by the state of Wisconsin providing for the inspection and grading of grain intended for delivery, storage, manufacture into flour, and reshipment in the state, which system of inspection was intended to and would have the effect of overthrowing the standard of inspection by which all sales and purchases of grain in interstate commerce had for many years been made according to the inspection system of Minnesota, were a regulation of commerce between the states and invalid. Globe Elevator Co. v. Andrew (1906) 144 Fed. 871, interlocutory order affirmed in (1907) 84 C. C. A. 376, 156 Fed. 664.

Inspection laws cannot be made applicable to commodities merely passing through a state from one state to another.

Thus, in Farris v. Henderson (1893) 1 Okla. 384, 33 Pac. 380, a county inspection law which applied to cattle being driven across the county from one state to another, fees being charged for such inspection, was held to be invalid, as a regulation of interstate commerce.

And in Georgetown v. Davidson (1868) 6 D. C. 278, it was held that an ordinance for the inspection of flour did not apply to flour which was merely transhipped at the place of inspection on its journey from one state to another, but that if the ordinance did apply to such flour it was inoperative and void.

Inspection fees.

While, by the terms of the Constitution of the United States, the fees which a state may impose for inspection are only such as "may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws," the courts apparently do not construe this language strictly, and reasonable fees, all of which are applied to inspection purposes, are sustained.

Thus, an inspection charge of 80 cents per hundred, for stamps to be affixed to packages of concentrated commercial feeding stuffs, is not on its face so unreasonably in excess of the cost of analysis, salaries of officials, and other necessary expenses, when applied to sales by importers in the original packages, as to invalidate the statute as a disguised revenue measure. Savage v. Jones (1912) 225 U. S. 501, 56 L. ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715.

Nor does an inspection fee of 10 cents per ton on concentrated commercial feeding stuffs, when sold or offered for sale within the state, or the exaction in lieu thereof in the case of condimental, patented, proprietary, or trademark stock or poultry foods, of an annual license fee of $100, render the statute invalid as applied to sales by importers in the original packages. Standard Stock Food Co. v. Wright (1912) 225 U. S. 540, 56 L. ed. 1197, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784.

A charge of  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent per gallon, made by a state oil inspection act for the avowed purpose of defraying the expense connected with the inspection, cannot be said, in advance of the experience gained from the actual operation of the act, to be so seriously in excess of what is necessary as to justify the imputation that the real purpose of the statute was to raise a revenue in violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Red "C" Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board of Agriculture (1912) 222 U. S. 380, 56 L. ed. 240, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 152, affirming (1909) 172 Fed. 695.

The amount of fee imposed for the inspection of articles of commerce does not render the statute, if otherwise valid, repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution where it is not so unreasonable and disproportionate to the services rendered as to challenge the good faith of the law. New Mexico ex rel. McLean v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. (1906) 203 U. S. 38, 51 L. ed. 78, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, affirming (1904) 12 N. M. 425, 78 Pac. 74, 79 Pac. 295.

An inspection charge of 25 cents per ton on commercial fertilizers is not so in excess of what is necessary to pay L.R.A.1916D.

cost of analysis, salaries of inspectors, cost of tags, and other charges, as to justify the imputation of bad faith and show that it is not a proper exercise of the police power. Patapasco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture (1898) 171 U. S. 345, 43 L. ed. 191, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 862.

A fee imposed by a state statute in favor of the state gauger for his services in gauging casks of wine imported at San Francisco is not unconstitutional as imposing duties on imports by state authority, or as interfering with the Federal government in its regulation of commerce, as the authority of the state to pass inspection laws involves the power of enforcing such laws by adequate provisions for the remuneration of officers charged with the duty of inspecting goods. Addison v. Saulnier (1861) 19 Cal. 82.

Where the object of a statute providing for inspection of hay was to protect the citizens from commodities that were unfit for commerce, and the fees allowed to the inspection officers were only remuneration for their services, and were not excessive, it does not amount to a levy on imports or a tax upon the products of other states. State v. Fosdick (1869) 21 La. Ann. 256.

An inspection fee not being an impost or a duty on imports or exports, it is immaterial whether it is absolutely necessary for executing the inspection laws of the state. Hay Inspectors v. Pleasants (1871) 23 La. Ann. 349.

See also STATE v. BARTLES OIL CO. ante, 193.

But a revenue law may not be disguised as an inspection law, and the imposition of fees largely in excess of what is required for inspection purposes, or the application of part of the fees to other purposes, will render a statute invalid.

A statute providing for the inspection of oils, which imposes a burden on interstate commerce by way of fees largely in excess of the expenses necessary for executing the inspection law, is unconstitutional. Castle v. Mason (1915) 91 Ohio St. 296, 110 N. E. 463.

If a state fixes an inspection fee materially greater than the cost of the inspection, it becomes not only a police measure, but also a revenue measure, and to the extent that the fees exceed the reasonably necessary cost of inspection they are invalid because in conflict with the commerce provisions of the Federal Constitution. Bartels Northern Oil Co. v. Jackman (1915) 29 N. D. 236, 150 N. W. 576.

A charge of 1 cent per bushel upon oysters coming from other states, levied by the Maryland oyster law to help defray the expenses of the inspection provided for by that statute, is unconstitutional as unlawfully interfering with interstate commerce, where such tax regularly yields a revenue largely in excess of the amount required to pay the salaries of the inspectors, and the excess is devoted to noninspection purposes. D. E. Foote & Co. v. Stanley (1914) 232 U. S. 494, 58 L. ed. 698, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 377, reversing (1912) 117 Md. 335, 82 Atl. 380.

A statute imposing a tax of 2 cents a bushel on all oysters that are sold by commission men and others selling less than a cargo cannot be upheld as an inspection law, where the act upon its face segregates one half of the charge and applies it to reselling the oyster bottoms of the state, thus enriching the resources of the state by a tax upon interstate commerce. D. E. Foote & Co. v. Clagett (1911) 116 Md. 228, 81 Atl. 511.

Messrs. Fred L. Laird and Fred B. Thomas for the life tenants.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Homer W. Heaton died testate January 28, 1899. By his will of October 5, 1895, he created the following trust, among others: "The residue and remainder of my estate I give to the aforesaid James W. Brock upon trust, and to his duly appointed successor in the trust hereby created, upon the trust that all the income of said residue and remainder of my estate by way of interest, dividends, rents, and profits be paid each and every year, or half or quarter year, if convenient, in the following manner; that is to say, one-third part thereof to my son Charles H. Heaton, for the full term and period of his natural life; and one-third part thereof to my son James S. Heaton for the full term and period of his natural life; and one-third part thereof to my grandchildren, Clifton M. Heaton and Ruby M. Heaton, in equal shares for the full term and period of the natural life of each one of them."

After making provision for the disposition of the shares of such life beneficiaries as should de cease during the term, the will further provides: "At the death of said Sarah S. Heaton (wife of Charles H. Heaton, mentioned elsewhere in the will) and my sons and grandchildren, the aforesaid trust and trusts are to be ended, and all the property and estate held upon trust is given to the lawful issue of said grandchildren and their heirs in equal shares per capita."

At the time of the testator's death he owned 105 shares of the capital stock of the Montpelier Savings Bank & Trust Company of the par value of $100 per share which was a part of the residue of his estate, and so a part of said trust fund. The testator gave positive directions that said stock, together with certain other property mentioned in his will, should be held until the termination of the trust. James W. Brock having resigned said trust, the appellee was, on January 31, 1913, appointed his successor as trustee and is now acting as such.

On December 15, 1913, the trustees of the Montpelier Savings Bank & Trust Company declared a dividend out of the surplus earnings of said bank under the following vote: "That a dividend of $100 per share payable L.R.A.1916D.

in new capital stock from the surplus earnings of the bank be paid to the stockholders of record at the close of business December 31, 1913, thereby increasing the capital stock to the sum of $100,000 represented by 1,000 shares of $100 each."

At the time such dividend was declared, said bank had no rule nor by-law touching its authority to declare dividends or increase its capital stock; so that its authority in this regard depended upon its charter and the general law.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts that at the time of the testator's death the surplus earnings of the bank were upwards of $50,000; and that from that time to the time said dividend was declared there had been a gradual increase of its surplus earnings, so that when said dividend was declared "the surplus earnings of said bank exceeded twice the amount of said surplus earnings at the time of the decease of said Homer W. Heaton by more than the amount of this dividend." It also appears that there has been a corresponding increase in the volume of the bank's business since said dividend was declared.

Pursuant to said vote, said dividend was paid to and accepted by all of the stockholders of the bank in new capital stock, and the dividend of 105 shares on account of the original stock held as part of the trust fund is now in the hands of the bank as trustee. Said bank claims to hold the new shares as part of the trust fund, while Charles H. Heaton, Clifton M. Heaton, and Ruby Heaton-Marks, the surviving life beneficiaries, claim said stock as income of the trust fund. The question arises on an appeal from the decree of the probate court upon the allowance of the annual account of the trustee. That court ordered that the 105 shares of new stock be charged to the account of income and paid and delivered in equal shares to the life tenants, from which decree the trustee appealed. The case was heard in the county court on an agreed statement of facts, and to its judgment affirming the decree of the probate court the trustee excepted. The single question before us is whether said dividend under the will is part of the corpus of the fund which the trustee should hold for the remaindermen, or income of such fund which should pass to the life tenants.

No question is made as to the authority of the bank to declare this dividend. There was nothing in its charter nor in the general law then in force forbidding such a dividend as the one in question. See No. 150, Acts of 1915, § 3. In the absence of some statute to the contrary, there is no legal objection to a corporation's declaring a dividend payable in stock out of its net income, leaving its ordinary capital unimpaired. Such a dividend operates to transfer distributable assets to the individual ownership of the stockholders, thus changing accumulated surplus into permanent capital, and thereby creating an additional liability of the corporation. The vote by which the dividend was declared recites that it was from the surplus earnings of the bank, and it will be presumed that it was declared from surplus earnings available for division among the stockholders. Walker v. Walker, 68 N. H. 407, 39 Atl. 432; Boardman v. Boardman, 78 Conn. 451, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 784, 62 Atl. 339; Kalbach v. Clark, 133 Iowa, 215, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 801, 110 N. W. 599, 12 Ann. Cas. 647.

Moreover, the transfer of surplus to capital would not impair the surplus fund that the bank was required by law to reserve, as paid-in capital is treated as part of such fund. See No. 158, Acts of 1910, § 69.

We may start our inquiry with the proposition, which will be recognized as elementary, that the income of trust funds belongs to the life tenant, while the corpus of the fund belongs to the remainderman. The difficulty lies in determining what is income and what corpus in the particular case, especially when a dividend in the form of stock is declared by the corporation. When the question is settled whether the dividend is to be regarded as income or as capital of the trust fund, the respective rights of the life tenant and remainderman are readily determined. While the case is one of first impression in this state, the question as to the conflicting rights of life beneficiaries and remaindermen to stock dividends has frequently arisen in other jurisdictions, and it has vexed the courts to formulate a rule that would invariably work out exact justice between the parties.

The early English rule, adopted in 1799, gave all extraordinary or unusual dividends declared during the life estate, whether in stock or cash, to the corpus, and not to the income. Brander v. Brander, 4 Ves. Jr. 800; Irving v. Houston, 4 Paton, 521. While this rule was recognized in England as late as 1856 (Cuming v. Boswell, 2 Jur. N. S. 1005, 4 Week. Rep. 752), there were frequent departures from it even among the earlier cases. See Preston v. Melville, 16 Sim. 163; Price v. Anderson, 15 Sim. 473; Johnson v. Johnson, 15 Jur. 714. The rule is now practically obsolete in England and of little more than historical value. The modern English rule is very much the same as the rule hereinafter referred to as the Massachusetts rule. See Bouch v. Sproule, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 385, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1037, 57 L. T. N. S. 345, 36 Week. Rep. 193; Re Hopkins, L. R. 18 Eq. 696, 43 L. L.R.A.1916D.

An examination of the American decisions discloses three distinct lines of cases. For convenience their doctrines may be designated as the Massachusetts rule, the Pennsylvania rule, and the Kentucky rule. It is worthy of notice that the American courts view the question from a common standpoint. They all expressly or impliedly recognize that the question whether a distribution made by a corporation during the continuance of a life estate is to be regarded as income or as capital is primarily one of construction,—a question of the intention of the creator of the trust manifested by the will or other instrument by which the right to the income is, for the time being, severed from the corpus. The difficulty arises when the will or other instrument merely directs the payment of "earnings" or "income" or "dividends" to the life tenant, and is not sufficiently explicit for the guidance of the court when the distribution by the corporation is of an unusual or extraordinary nature. As we shall see, the application of this principle plays an important part in working out the several rules adopted by the courts of this country, which, though starting from a common premise, reach widely divergent conclusions.

The Massachusetts rule regards all cash dividends, however large, as income and stock dividends, however made, as capital. This rule was first announced in Minot v. Paine, 99 Mass. 108, 96 Am. Dec. 705. It will be observed that under this rule it makes no difference when the dividend was earned, provided it was declared out of net earnings during the life tenancy. It makes the character of the dividend, whether in cash or stock, the criterion of the rights of the parties.

The Pennsylvania rule, declared in Earp's Appeal, 28 Pa. 368, is that net earnings when declared as dividends, whether in stock or cash, belong to the life tenant, provided such earnings have been made, or have accumulated, since the stock in question was held as part of the trust estate. The rule differs from the Massachusetts rule in two important particulars: (1) It makes no difference whether the dividend is declared in stock or cash; and (2) it takes into account the time when the earnings were made or accrued. It does not make the character of the dividend the criterion, but looks to its source to determine the right of the parties. It inquires as to the time covered by the accumulation of earnings from which the dividend was declared relative to the inception of the life estate. Thus, if it is ascertained that the entire fund accumulated before the inception of the life estate, the Pennsylvania rule awards the entire dividend, whether cash or stock, to the corpus; and, if it is ascertained that the entire fund accumulated after the inception of and during the continuance of the life estate, it awards the entire dividend, whether stock or cash, to income. Further, if it is found that the fund from which the dividend was declared accumulated partly before and partly after the inception of the life estate, it apportions the dividend, whether stock or cash, between the life tenant and remainderman.

The third rule was formerly known as the New York and Kentucky rule, but since Re Osborne, 209 N. Y. 450, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 510, 103 N. E. 723, 823, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 298, is referred to as the Kentucky rule, as in that case the court of appeals of New York receded from its former position and adopted the apportionment feature of the Pennsylvania rule. The Kentucky rule is like the Pennsylvania rule, in that it makes no distinction between cash and stock dividends declared out of surplus earnings, but differs therefrom in holding that dividends, whether stock or cash, are nonapportionable and are considered as accruing in their entirety as of the date when they are declared. See Hite v. Hite, 93 Ky. 257, 19 L.R.A. 173, 40 Am. St. Rep. 189, 20 S. W. 778.

We are not now concerned with the point of difference between the Pennsylvania and Kentucky rules, as the question of apportionment is not involved in this case. The surplus earnings of the bank at the time the dividend was declared were more than three times what they amounted to at the time of Mr. Heaton's death; so the stock dividend did not intrench in any degree upon the capital of the trust fund created by the will, as there still remained more than twice as much surplus as there was at the time of the testator's death. The whole amount transferred by the dividend from surplus to invested capital may properly be considered as earnings of the bank during the life tenancy.

Having in mind that the intention of the testator is to control if it can be gathered from the will, we have carefully examined its provisions in the light of the surrounding circumstances, but find there no satisfactory solution of the question. The provision that all the income of the trust fund, including the bank stock in question, "by way of interest, dividends, rents and profits," should go to the life tenant, is broad enough to include by implication this stock dividend. The word "dividends" considered with its context might mean more than ordinary cash dividends; but the will lacks certainty on this point, there not being enough in the will to make it clear that the testator contemplated such a dividend as the one in controversy, so we must look to the law to determine whether it should be regarded as income of the trust fund or as part of the fund itself.

It is impossible to reconcile the decisions of the courts that follow the Massachusetts rule with those that adopt the Pennsylvania rule either with or without its apportionment feature. It would not be profitable to attempt any extended review of the conflicting decisions, as they are readily accessible. A complete review of the cases will be found in the following notes: 118 Am. St. Rep. 162; 12 Ann. Cas. 647; Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1218; Ann. Cas. 1915A, 311; 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 768; 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 563; 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 510; 7 R. C. L. 289-292. It will answer our present purpose to examine a few of the leading cases to discover the reasons advanced by the courts for their decisions. The Massachusetts rule has found favor outside that jurisdiction in Connecticut, Rhode Island, Illinois, and possibly Ohio, and has been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. See Smith v. Dana, 77 Conn. 543, 69 L.R.A. 76, 107 Am. St. Rep. 51, 60 Atl. 117; Re Brown, 14 R. I. 371, 51 Am. Rep. 397; De Koven v. Alsop, 205 Ill. 309, 63 L.R.A. 587, 68 N. E. 930; Wilberding v. Miller, 88 Ohio St. 609, L.R.A. 1916A, 718, 106 N. E. 665; Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. ed. 525, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057. The supreme court of Ohio quotes with apparent approval the arguments in support of this rule, but disposes of the case, as it would appear, on the express intention of the testator as gathered from the will. Among the courts that follow the Pennsylvania rule, either with or without its apportionment feature, are the courts of last resort in Maine, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, South Carolina, Mississippi, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. See Gilkey v. Paine, 80 Me. 319, 14 Atl. 205; Holbrook v. Holbrook, 74 N. H. 201, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 768, 66 Atl. 124; McLouth v. Hunt, 154 N. Y. 179, 39 L.R.A. 230, 48 N. E. 548; Van Doren v. Olden, 19 N. J. Eq. 176, 97 Am. Dec. 650; Bryan v. Aiken, — Del. —, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 477, 86 Atl. 674; Thomas v. Gregg, 78 Md. 546, 44 Am. St. Rep. 310, 28 Atl. 565; *Hite v. E. 959; Wallace v. Wallace, 90 S. C. 61, 72 S. E. 553; Kalbach v. Clark, 133 Iowa,

The decisions in Georgia are influenced by statute, and so shed little, if any, light on the discussion.

The argument in support of the Massachusetts rule is based upon the assumption that it is within the discretion of the corporation, acting in good faith, to determine whether earnings shall be withheld or distributed, and that its action in that respect, within the limits of good faith, is binding upon the parties; and that consequently the life tenant has no right in respect of any earnings accumulated by the corporation, whether before or after the inception of the life estate, unless and until the corporation has declared a distribution of such earnings. In other words, that until such a distribution has been declared any enhancement in value of the stock by reason of the withholding of earnings inures entirely to the benefit of the corpus, and the life tenant derives no advantage therefrom. It was said in Minot v. Paine, supra: "The money in the hands of the directors may be income to the corporation; but it is not so to a stockholder till a dividend is made; and, where the company invest it in buildings and machinery, or in railroad tracks, depots, rolling stock, or any other permanent improvements, for enlarging or carrying on their legitimate business, it never becomes income to the shareholder. The investment becomes an accretion to the capital; and it is equally so whether they increase the number of shares, . . . or leave the shares unaltered. Or if the number of shares is increased for purposes merely speculative, it is an increase of capital stock, and not of income; and it would be practically unwise for courts to go behind the action of the company . . . to ascertain how they came by the funds out of which they declare either cash or stock dividends. As the corporation is the legal owner of the property and has power, within the limits of its charter, to give to the shareholders either an increase of income or an increase of capital, out of the money in its hands, according to the discretion of its directors, it would seem to follow that an increase of capital should be kept for the remainderman, and an increase of income should be paid to the tenant for life."

The court adopted the rule as a matter of expediency, saying: "A trustee needs some plain principle to guide him; and the cestuis que trust ought not to be subjected to the expense of going behind the action of the directors, and investigating the concerns of the corporation, especially if it is out of our L.R.A.1916D.

jurisdiction. A simple rule is to regard cash dividends, however large, as income, and stock dividends, however made, as capital."

While the rule is simple and convenient and is calculated to relieve the courts, as well as trustees, of much trouble, it does not commend itself for its justice and equity. It has been frankly admitted by the court of its origin that the rule is arbitrary and sometimes defeats the intention of the testator. See D'Ooge v. Leeds, 176 Mass. 558, 560, 57 N. E. 1025. And another court that follows it has stated that it was not claimed for the rule that its application would accomplish exact justice in all cases. Boardman v. Boardman, 78 Conn. 451, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 784, 62 Atl. 339. One is led to question whether in their desire to formulate a workable rule of easy application the courts that adopt the Massachusetts rule have not unconsciously preferred expediency to justice. The hardship that would result to a life tenant under this rule in case the corporation pursued the policy of declaring stock dividends is perfectly apparent. The injustice attending its application has repeatedly moved the court that announced it to follow the spirit of the Pennsylvania rule, though at the same time reaffirming Minot v. Paine. The courts professing to follow the rule look behind the vote declaring the dividend, thus regarding substance and not form, and do not hesitate to award a dividend in cash to the remainderman when investigation shows it to have been declared from the corpus of the fund; and in some cases have gone so far as to hold a dividend in stock to have been in substance a cash dividend. Heard v. Eldredge, 109 Mass. 258, 12 Am. Rep. 687; Leland v. Hayden, 102 Mass. 542; Davis v. Jackson, 152 Mass. 58, 23 Am. St. Rep. 801, 25 N. E. 21; Lyman v. Pratt, 183 Mass. 58, 66 N. E. 423; Green v. Bissell, 79 Conn. 547, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1011, 118 Am. St. Rep. 156, 65 Atl. 1056, 9 Ann. Cas. 287. But for the most part they regard a dividend in stock, even from the earnings of the corporation accumulated during the life tenancy, as belonging to capital, and not income. The tendency of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts toward a rule more liberal to the life tenant is indicated in its later decisions. See Gray v. Hemenway, 212 Mass. 239, 98 N. E. 789; Boston Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Adams, 219 Mass. 175, 106 N. E. 590. It is also significant that the courts adhering to the Massachusetts rule pretty generally hold that a dividend payable optionally in cash or stock is a cash dividend, even when stock is taken, and so belonging to the life tenant. Hyde v. Holmes, 198 Mass. 287, 84 N. E. 318;

Newport Trust Co. v. Van Rensselaer, 32 R. I. 231, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 563, 78 Atl. 1009.

Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. ed. 525, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057, decided in 1890, is much relied upon by the courts following the Massachusetts rule. The case follows and adopts the reasoning of Minot v. Paine. After saying that money earned by a corporation remains the property of the corporation, and does not become the property of the stockholders unless and until it is distributed among them by the corporation, and that its undistributed earnings may be treated and dealt with by the corporation either as property or as an addition to capital, the opinion continues: "Which of these courses shall be pursued is to be determined by the directors, with due regard to the condition of the company's property and affairs as a whole; and, unless in case of fraud or bad faith on their part, their discretion in this respect cannot be controlled by the courts."

Based upon this reasoning, the court held that reserved and accumulated earnings, so long as they are held and invested by the corporation, being a part of the corporate property, it would follow that the interest therein represented by each share is capital, and not income of that share as between the life tenant and remainderman.

In support of this decision, the court argues further that the question whether the profits of the corporation should be distributed as income to the life tenant or retained as capital, thus inuring to the benefit of the remainderman, is a question to be determined by the action of the corporation itself in the proper administration of its affairs; and cannot, without producing great embarrassment and inconvenience, be left open to be tried and determined by the courts. The decision evidently turns upon a presumption as to the intention of the testator. The court says: "In ascertaining the rights of such persons, the intention of the testator, so far as manifested by him, must of course control; but, when he has given no special direction upon the question as to what shall be considered principal and what income, he must be presumed to have had in view the lawful power of the corporation over the use and apportionment of its earnings, and to have intended that the determination of that question should depend upon the regular action of the corporation with regard to all its shares. Therefore, when a distribution of earnings is made by a corporation among its stockholders, the question whether such distribution is an apportionment of additional stock . . . or a division of profits and income depends upon the substance and intent of L.R.A.1916D.

the action of the corporation, as manifested by its vote or resolution; and ordinarily a dividend declared in stock is to be deemed capital, and a dividend in money is to be deemed income, of each share."

In support of this view, it is argued that a stock dividend really takes nothing from the property of the corporation and adds nothing to the interests of the shareholders; that the only change is in the evidence which represents the shareholders' interests, the new shares and the original shares together representing the same proportional interest that the original shares represented before the issue of the new ones.

Gibbons v. Mahon has never been reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and so has only the weight of a single decision, although the standing of the court entitles it to careful consideration. It is an interesting fact in this connection that Mr. Justice Gray, who wrote the opinion, was a member of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts when Minot v. Paine was decided, which in a measure accounts for the similarity of reasoning in the two cases.

The supreme court of Illinois held, in De Koven v. Alsop, 205 Ill. 309, 63 L.R.A. 587, 68 N. E. 930, that a stock dividend which evidences the conversion by the corporation of earnings accumulated during the testator's lifetime into capital of the corporation goes to the remainderman as a part of the corpus of the estate; and reaffirmed this decision in Blinn v. Gillett, 208 Ill. 473, 100 Am. St. Rep. 234, 70 N. E. 104, and Billings v. Warren, 216 Ill. 281, 74 N. E. 1050. It does not appear that any of the stock dividends involved in these cases covered accumulations made after the death of the testator. That being so, the result is the same as it would have been had the court followed the other rule; but it appears that the court is committed to the Massachusetts rule, as it cites with approval Minot v. Paine and Gibbons v. Mahon and adopts their argument. No additional argument is advanced in support of its conclusions.

The later English rule is similar to the Massachusetts rule and is based upon much the same reasoning. Neville, J., in Jones v. Evans [1913] 1 Ch. 23, 82 L. J. Ch. Div. N. S. 12, decided in 1912, says: "From the necessity of the case it has always been held that, as between tenant for life and remainderman, the court must decide whether a particular fund is to be treated as capital or whether it is to be divided as income by way of dividend; and one does not see very well how any other rule could apply."

The reason for the rule assigned by the English courts is tersely summed up in

Sproule v. Bouch, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 638: "What the company says is income shall be income, and what it says is capital shall be capital."

Referring to the distinction sought to be made between stock and cash dividends, Lord Chancellor Eldon, in Paris v. Paris, 10 Ves. Jr. 185, used a homely but expressive phrase. He said: "As to the distinction between stock and money, that is too thin; and if the law is that, this extraordinary profit, if given in the shape of stock, shall be considered capital, it must be capital if given as money."

It seems to us that it does not follow as a necessary conclusion, assuming that the corporation or its directors have the authority claimed for them over the disposition of its surplus earnings, that the action of the corporation or its directors is conclusive of the rights of the life tenant and remainderman, and that therein lies the weakness of the argument. It fails to distinguish capital as regards the corporation and its stockholders from capital or corpus of the trust fund. Moreover, it rests upon a presumption that is altogether artificial as a rule of construction, and little less than violent when applied to the facts of this case, where the testator was making provision for his children and grandchildren, who were at the time members of his own immediate family, by way of life income with remainder to a succeeding generation as yet unborn. If any presumption is to be indulged, it seems more rational to presume that the creator of the trust intends, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that the life beneficiary shall receive all the profits of the stock earned during the life tenancy which may be released from corporate control by distribution among the stockholders during the existence of the life estate, in whatever form the distribution may be made. This recognizes the assumed right of the corporation to distribute surplus earnings at such times and in such manner as best suits the purposes of the corporation, and at the same time takes into account the evident distinction between capital of the corporation and corpus of the trust fund when the rights of the life tenant and remainderman are being considered. As said in Soehnlein v. Soehnlein, 146 Wis. 330, 131 N. W. 739: "To say that when a stockholder conveys his stock, as in this case, he thinks otherwise than that the term owner will take all benefits, as to such stock, of dividends out of earnings made during such term, regardless of the manner of making the dividends, seems contrary to common knowledge."

Mr. Thompson, in his work on Corporations, says in criticism of this rule: "The L.R.A.1916D.

Massachusetts doctrine seems to be a rule of mere convenience, and not a rule of justice. It loses sight of the real question under consideration, which is, what is capital of the estate disposed of by will, and not, what is capital of the corporation; and it goes entirely beyond tenable ground when it allows this question to be determined, not by the judicial courts upon a view of the real substance of the case, but by a board of directors, that is, by a committee of persons entirely foreign to the will, in passing a resolution declaring a dividend." 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2222.

The same author expresses a clarifying truth when he says: "Instead of attempting to lay down a hard and fast rule on the subject which shall be applicable to all cases—and herein lies the chief mistake which the courts have made in dealing with it—it should be determined upon the consideration of the actual nature of the dividend in each particular case." 2 Thomp. Corp. § 2192.

The courts that reject the Massachusetts rule generally agree that the action of the corporation converting earnings into capital gives them that character for all corporate purposes, but they hold that the action of the corporation does not bind the life tenant and remainderman, and that either can always show the true nature and source of the dividend in spite of any act or declaration of the corporation. This is the evident trend of the later decisions, and, as we have seen, is in a measure shared by the courts that profess to follow Minot v. Paine and Gibbons v. Mahon. We shall need to examine but few of the numerous decisions following the Pennsylvania rule in order to contrast their argument with that of the cases based upon the Massachusetts rule.

Earp's Appeal, 28 Pa. 368, was decided in 1857. By his will Robert Earp created a trust for the benefit of his children, the rents, income, and interest of the trust fund to go to them during life with remainder over. The trust fund consisted in part of 540 shares of stock of a certain manufacturing corporation, of the par value of $50 but worth $125 per share at the time of the testator's death, owing to surplus earnings accumulated during his lifetime. The surplus of the corporation continued to increase after the testator's death until the stock dividend was declared. This was accomplished by issuing new shares of the par value of $80 per share in lieu of the original stock. By the redistribution of stock, Robert Earp's estate received 1,350 shares of the new stock, surrendering therefor the original shares. The court argued that the testator's interest in the corporation at the time of his death amounted to $67,500; that it would have produced that sum if sold at that time; that the omission to sell and invest the proceeds for the purposes of the trust could not change the rights of the parties. It was held that the life beneficiary had no right to the income accumulated before the testator's death, but that the profits arising since his death were income within the meaning of the will. Speaking of the right of the corporation to deal with its surplus earnings, the court says: "The managers might withhold the distribution of it for a time, for reasons beneficial to the interests of the parties entitled. But they could not, by any form of procedure whatever, deprive the owners of it, and give it to others not entitled. The omission to distribute it semi-annually, as it accumulated, makes no change in its ownership. The distribution of it among the stockholders in the form of new certificates has no effect whatever upon the equitable right to it. It makes no kind of difference whether this fund is secured by 540 or 1,350 certificates. Its character cannot be changed by the evidences given to secure it. Part of it is principal,—the rest is 'income,' within the meaning of the will. The principal must remain unimpaired during the lives of the appellants, and the 'income' arising since the death of the testator is to be distributed among them."

Pritchitt v. Nashville Trust Co. 96 Tenn. 472, 33 L.R.A. 856, 36 S. W. 1064, one of the later cases on the subject, is especially instructive. It involved stock dividends on account of surplus accumulated after the death of the creator of the trust. The court points out that present enjoyment is the very essence of a life estate; that without it the gift would be meaningless and worthless. The case contains an exhaustive review of Gibbons v. Mahon; and, though concurring in all that the Federal Supreme Court said concerning the authority of the corporation over dividends, the court dissents vigorously from the conclusion as to the effect of corporate action upon life tenants and remaindermen. To quote from the opinion: "There can be no doubt that reserved and accumulated earnings . . . are corporate property; nevertheless, we are unable to see how that fact determines or affects the question of interest therein as between life tenant and remainderman of shares. Those persons acquire their interests under the will or deed, and not through any action of the corporation."

Further, in commenting upon what is said in Gibbons v. Mahon to the effect that the only change produced by a stock dividend is in the evidence which represents the stockholders' interest, the court says: "Obviously, this change 'in the evidence' of the shareholder's interest separates his income on the investment from his capital invested, the new shares representing his income and the old ones his capital; and it would seem that a separation of the combined interests of life tenant and remainderman is wrought by the same process, the new shares standing for income of the trust estate and the old ones for its capital, at least to the extent that the new capitalization includes net earnings made since the trust took effect. The trustee has made no new investment. He has only received new shares representing profits of the investment made by the founder of the trust. How can the facts that net earnings are made capital to the company, and that the issuance of stock dividends thereon do not diminish corporate property, prevent such dividends from being income to the holder of old shares, whether that holder be absolute owner or only tenant for life?"

Bryan v. Aiken, — Del. —, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 477, 86 Atl. 674, decided by the supreme court of Delaware in 1913, gives an exhaustive review of the authorities. With reference to the effect of the action of the corporation upon the rights of the life tenant and remainderman of corporate stock, the court says: "Although a corporation has the right to set apart or reserve a portion of its net earnings for a period of years, and treat them as capital, . . . yet if it subsequently divides such net earnings . . . by declaring a dividend in cash, in stock, or in both, based upon such earnings, it is a distribution of profits. When the necessity for the reservation ceases, and the reserve fund is divided among the shareholders, the question whether it was income or capital depends upon its origin, for their source is not changed by the delay in distribution. If it was originally taken from the net earnings, it belongs to the tenant for life, if distributed in his lifetime."

The discussion of the question by the supreme court of Kentucky in Hite v. Hite, 93 Ky. 257, 19 L.R.A. 173, 40 Am. St. Rep. 189, 20 S. W. 778, is worthy of special notice. The court grants that, as between the company and the shareholder, the action of the directors in determining whether earnings shall be capitalized or paid out in cash is conclusive; but holds that, when a dividend is once declared, although in stock, it is the province of the law to determine their ownership,—whether they belong to the corpus of the estate and are to benefit the remainderman, or whether they shall go to the life tenant as income. Speaking of a stock dividend based upon the earnings of the company, the court said: "It is in reality, whether called by one name or another, the income of the capital invested in it. It is but a mode of distributing the profit. If it be not income, what is it? If it is, then it is rightfully and equitably the property of the life tenant. If it be really profit, then he should have it, whether paid in stock or money. A stock dividend proper is the issue of new shares, paid for by the transfer of a sum equal to their par value from the profit and loss account to that representing capital stock; and really a corporation has no right to declare a dividend, . . . except from its earnings; and a singular state of case—it seems to us an unreasonable one—is presented, if the company, although it rests with it whether it will declare a dividend, can bind the courts as to the proper ownership of it, and by the mode of payment substitute its will for that of the testator, and favor the life tenant or the remainderman, as it may desire. It cannot in reason be considered that the testator contemplated such a result. The law regards substance, and not form, and such a rule might result not only in a violation of the testator's intention, but it would give the power to the corporation to beggar the life tenants, who, in this case, are the wife and children of the testator, for the benefit of the remaindermen, who may perhaps be unknown to the testator, being unborn when the will was executed. We are unwilling to adopt a rule which, to us, seems so arbitrary and devoid of reason and justice."

To much the same effect is McLouth v. Hunt, 154 N. Y. 179, 39 L.R.A. 230, 48 N. E. 548, and Soehnlein v. Soehnlein, 146 Wis. 330, 131 N. W. 739. In Thomas v. Gregg, 78 Md. 545, 44 Am. St. Rep. 310, 28 Atl. 565, the supreme court of Maryland, after a careful review of the authorities, reaches the conclusion that there are but few cases, if any, that can properly be construed to mean that, although the stock dividends only include net earnings, and they were intended to be distributed as income, and not as capital, yet the life tenants must be deprived of them simply because they were stock dividends. It was held: "When it is possible for the court to ascertain to any certainty whether the distribution in the stock dividend includes net earnings, and, if so, what proportion, and also whether such earnings were intended to be made a part of the capital or merely to be used temporarily with the intention on the part of the directors of refunding them to the shareholders as income, we think it is the duty of the court to make such investigations and dispose of the stock in an equitable way between the tenants for life and the remaindermen." L.R.A.1916D.

If we regard the intention of the trustees of the bank in declaring the dividend of any importance, it is clear from the vote declaring it that the dividend in the case at bar was intended as a distribution of surplus among the stockholders, which had been accumulated at the expense of regular cash dividends. Though payable in stock, it was as much compensation to the stockholders for loss of income as it would have been if paid in cash.

The Pennsylvania rule has been recently restated by the court of appeals in Re Osborne, 209 N. Y. 450, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 510, 103 N. E. 723, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 298: "Extraordinary dividends, payable from the accumulated earnings of the company, whether payable in cash or stock, belong to the life beneficiary, unless they entrench, in whole or in part, upon the capital of the trust fund as received from the testator or maker of the trust or invested in the stock, in which case such extraordinary dividends should be returned to the trust fund or apportioned between the trust fund and the life beneficiary in such a way as to preserve . . . the trust fund."

This is in effect what the supreme court of Pennsylvania has held since the time of Earp's Appeal. See Boyer's Appeal, 224 Pa. 144, 73 Atl. 320; Stokes's Estate, 240 Pa. 277, 87 Atl. 971.

Most of the authorities in this country, including the Federal Supreme Court, recognize that the owner of corporate stock may convey the beneficial interest therein for a time to one and the whole ownership in remainder to another, unhampered by any power lodged in the corporation to disturb the purpose of the conveyance. It follows that the controlling factor is the intention of the creator of the trust, expressed in the will or other instrument creating the trust or presumed by the law, in the absence of anything therein from which it can be ascertained. Whenever a distribution of earnings is made, whatever its form, the distributive share, so far as the owner of the stock is concerned, is income, and for that reason an incident of the ownership of the stock during the period of accumulation, although inchoate until distributed by the corporation. If the testator had been living at the time the dividend in question was declared, unquestionably the new shares would have represented to him income on his original investment. He could have disposed of them without diminution of the investment represented by the value of the original shares as of the date of his death. With his estate they stand the same, only that now two classes are interested,—the life tenants entitled to the income and the remaindermen entitled to the corpus of the fund. In construing his will it is only reasonable to presume that the testator used the word "income" in the sense it would have when applied to the stock while he was living; so that what would have been income to him, if living, should be regarded as income to his estate after his death. This is the doctrine of the Pennsylvania rule, and accords with what we regard as the decided weight of authority.

Appellant's counsel refer to the animadversions of Stevens, V. C., on the Pennsylvania rule found in Ballantine v. Young, 79 N. J. Eq. 71, 81 Atl. 119, as indicating a disposition on the part of the New Jersey courts to follow the English rule. The views expressed were the personal views of the vice chancellor, and cannot be taken as showing that the court of errors is inclined to depart from its former holdings.

It is claimed that the English rule is binding upon us by virtue of P. S. 1221, by which so much of the common law of England as is applicable to the local situation and circumstances is adopted as the law of this state. The question as to the binding effect of the decisions of the courts of England in cases arising here requiring the application of common-law principles is for the first time presented to this court. The question has arisen in some of the other states, most of which have statutes adopting the common law that are similar to ours. Some courts hold to the view that the common law thus adopted is identical with the decisions of the courts; or, in other words, they regard the common law of England as what the English courts make it. The predominant view, however, is that precedents do not constitute the common law, but only serve to illustrate its principles; that statutes adopting it do not require adherence to the decisions of the court of England even prior to the separation of the colonies, in case the court considers subsequent decisions, either in England or America, better expositions of the general principles of the common law. This view accepts what Sir Frederick Pollock has called "the immemorial and yet freshly growing fabric of the common law" as the guide, and not the decision of any particular court at any particular time. Whether our statute makes the decisions of the English courts controlling, or leaves the courts at liberty to decide for themselves, the principle of law applicable to the particular case depends upon the intention of the legislature to be gathered from the statute of adoption read in the light of surrounding circumstances.

Followed to its logical conclusion, the view that the common law is what the English courts make it compels one of two results,—either we must abide the time that the courts of England see fit to modify their rules of law to meet changing conditions and circumstances, or we must regard the common law as inflexible, depending upon the rule of decision prevailing in England at the time of its adoption here. It is clear that our legislature did not intend either result, as both are inconsistent with the due administration of justice. The founders of the state were not unmindful of the necessity for a system of laws that would readily adapt themselves to the changing conditions of society; while the effect of the statute claimed by the appellant would either petrify the common law as embodied in the decisions of the English courts at the time of the separation, or would require the courts to administer the common law blindly in accordance with decisions of the courts of the country of which they had recently declared their independence. The construction we give to the statute is supported by the original statute of adoption enacted in 1779, by which it was provided that: "The common law as generally practised and understood in the New England states be, and is hereby established as the common law of this state."

We are confirmed in this view by what Judge Nathaniel Chipman says in his dissertation on the act. He says: "By the common law of England, exclusive of positive laws enacted by statute, are understood those rules and maxims by which decisions are made in their courts of law, whether in relation to the mode of prosecuting a right or to the right itself,—rules and maxims which have been there adopted, 'time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.'"

He makes it clear that the act did not adopt the English precedents expositive of the common law, but rather its principles, when he says, quoting Lord Mansfield: "The law of England . . . would be an absurd science indeed, were it decided upon precedents only. Precedents serve to illustrate principles and to give them a fixed certainty, but the law of England, . . . exclusive of positive law enacted by statute, depends upon principles."

He continues: "We may . . . lay it down that this statute gives the citizens of this state the rules, maxims, and precedents of the common law so far as they serve to illustrate principles,—principles only which, from the situation of society with us, exist in this state." N. Chip. 117-139.

In State v. Parker, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 298, 6 Am. Dec. 735, Judge Chipman says, by way of caution: "I would not have it understood, by anything which I have said, that this court is limited by the precedents of decided cases at common law, or the research of the numerous and profound commentators. The common law, exclusive of positive law enacted by statute, depends on principles. Precedents and maxims serve to embody and illustrate principles to give them a fixed certainty."

We have no doubt that the statute in question leaves the court free to inquire whether the reasoning of a particular case is satisfactory, and to accept or reject the rule it announces. The responsibility of discovering and applying to the case in hand the proper principles of the common law as it prevails in this state rests upon the courts of the state to which have been committed the administration of the law. In discharging this duty it has always been their practice to give heed to the decisions of the English court, whether rendered before or since the separation, giving them such weight as they are entitled to as evidence of what the law is; but we cannot agree that they are entitled to any such binding force as the appellant claims for them. See 5 R. C. L. 818; notes in Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1222, 1232; Williams v. Miles, 68 Neb. 463, 62 L.R.A. 383, 110 Am. St. Rep. 431, 94 N. W. 705, 96 N. W. 151, 4 Ann. Cas. 306; Rensselaer Glass Factory v. Reid, 5 Cow. 587; Forbes v. Scannell, 13 Cal. 242; Robert v. West, 15 Ga. 122; Cox v. Morrow, 14 Ark. 603; Com. v. York, 9 Met. 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373; Kallenbach v. Dickinson, 100 Ill. 427, 39 Am. Rep. 47; Morgan v. King, 30 Barb. 13; Marks v. Morris, 4 Hen. & M. 463. Much light is shed upon this question in an article by Herbert Pope on English Common Law in the United States, 24 Harvard L. Rev. 6; also, in an essay by Paul Samuel Reinsch on English Common Law in the American Colonies. 1 Anglo-American Legal History, 367.

It is also said that the life tenants are not entitled to the enhanced value of the corpus of the fund, instancing the increase in value of the real property that forms part of this trust estate; but there is a clear distinction between accretions to the fund derived from earnings accumulated during the term, and the enhanced value of the trust property due to other causes. The one is properly income, while the other is not.

We do not regard the question of convenience, of which so much is said by the courts that follow the Massachusetts rule, as a serious objection. The latter rule, as applied in practice, is somewhat less simple and easy of application than the statement of it would seem to imply; for the reason that, as applied, it is always necessary to ascertain whether the distribution by the corporation is from earnings or income, or whether it represents a reduction or change in form of the capital, or an enhancement of the value of the capital assets by means other than the accumulation of earnings. But, despite the difficulties attending it, the court should endeavor in every case to do justice between the parties and at the same time effectuate the intention of the creator of the trust. We believe that this result is most closely approximated by classifying a dividend according to what it really represents, and not according to the form in which it is declared. By the rule we adopt, the life tenant receives all the profits of the corporation accumulated during the life of the trust which are released from corporate control and distributed among the stockholders during the life tenancy, regardless of the form of the distribution; and the remainderman receives at the end of the term the corpus of the trust fund undiminished in value from what it was at the inception of the trust, which is all that he can justly claim, unless the creator of the trust has evidenced an intention that he shall receive more. It works out exact justice between the parties, and, we believe, will more often give effect to the unexpressed intention of the testator.

We therefore hold that the stock issued to the trustee was income of the trust fund belonging to the life tenants. The court below did not err in affirming the decree of the probate court.

Judgment affirmed, to be certified to the Probate Court.

Annotation—Rights as between life tenant and remainderman in dividends or distributions by corporations.

These notes are not concerned with cases like Re Bates [1907] 1 Ch. (Eng.) L.R.A.1916D.

22, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 29, 95 L. T. N. S. 753, 23 Times L. R. 15, in which the claim of the remainderman in a dividend declared during the life estate is based upon the principles applicable to wasting securities, and is in effect a corollary of the contention that it is the duty of the trustees to realize on the stock and place the proceeds in a proper investment.

These notes do not in general assume to deal with the responsibility of trustee who, through a mistake of law or otherwise, turns over to the life tenant dividends he should have retained for the corpus, or vice versa. Reference, however, is made in this connection to a modification by the surrogate in Re Tod (1914) 86 Misc. 616, 148 N. Y. Supp. 618, of its earlier decision (1914) 85 Misc. 298, 147 N. Y. Supp. 161, cited in the note in 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 515, surcharging trustees with stock received upon a stock dividend which belonged to the corpus, but which, in reliance upon earlier New York decisions, and under a mistake of law as it was subsequently declared in the Osborne Case, they turned over to the life tenants as part of the income. As the result of the modification the trustees were surcharged only with the capital value of the dividend shares which they had turned over to the life tenants as of the date of the distribution, at which time they also, in the exercise of the discretion vested in them by the will, disposed of the original shares, notwithstanding the contention, in behalf of the remainderman, that they should be surcharged with the specific shares, and the life tenants compelled to transfer such shares to the trust fund for the benefit of the remainderman, their market value having increased. The court said in effect that all the parties acted in good faith, and that while such a disposition of the matter enabled the life tenants to profit by the mistake of the trustees, the remaindermen suffered no loss on account of it, as the assumption was that the trustees would have disposed of the dividend shares with the original shares if they had regarded them as belonging to the corpus.

The importance of ascertaining the intention of the testator as manifested by the will in determining the respective rights of life tenant and remainderman in dividends or distributions declared by the corporations receives additional recognition in Wilberding v. Miller (1914) 88 Ohio St. 609, L.R.A. 1916A, 718, 106 N. E. 665, and RE HEATON, ante, 201, although, as is true of most of the cases, the wills in these cases did not yield any specific intention on the point. L.R.A.1916D.

The Massachusetts rule, which makes the character of the dividend, i. e., whether it is essentially a cash dividend or a stock dividend, the criterion of the rights of the parties, and refuses to make any apportionment, assuming that the dividend really represents earnings, and not capital, is reaffirmed in Talbot v. Milliken (1915) 221 Mass. 367, 108 N. E. 1060. The circumstances of the case illustrate the rigidity, if not the injustice, of the Massachusetts rule. The cash dividend of $50 per share which, by the application of the Massachusetts rule, was awarded in that case to the income, represented earnings of the corporation that had accumulated before the death of the testator, and the declaration of the dividend was the result of a modification of an arrangement, made after the testator's death, for a sale of the control of the corporation. It appeared that an offer of $225 per share had been received, and some of the directors suggested that instead of a sale at that price, the prospective purchasers should offer $175 per share after a special dividend of $50 per share had been declared, in addition to the regular dividend, to be paid from the accumulated surplus or profits; and that arrangement was carried out. It thus appears that by the application of the Massachusetts rule, and simply because the dividend was declared in cash, earnings which had accumulated before the inception of the trust were, to the extent of $50 per share, diverted to the life beneficiaries, notwithstanding that, if the original proposition for the sale of the stock had been carried out, the $50 per share would have inured to the benefit of the corpus rather than of the income.

The Massachusetts rule is adopted in Humphrey v. Lang (1915) 169 N. C. 601, L.R.A. 1916B, 626, 86 S. E. 526. The court said in support of this rule: "A stock dividend differs materially from a cash dividend. The former takes nothing from the property of the corporation, and adds nothing to the interests of the shareholders. Its property is not diminished, and their interests are not increased; whereas, a cash dividend declared on the then existing capital stock subtracts so much from the treasury of the corporation and transfers it to the pockets of the stockholders." As shown by the earlier notes, this is the line of reasoning generally employed in support of the Massachusetts rule.

But the Vermont supreme court in RE HEATON, supra, rejected the Massachusetts doctrine. The court did not decide whether or not the principle of apportionment should be adopted, as the stock dividend in question was declared from earnings which accumulated wholly after the inception of the life estate; and was, accordingly, in harmony with the Pennsylvania rule in that event, awarded in its entirety to the income.

In Poole v. Union Trust Co. (1916) — Mich. —, 157 N. W. 430, also, the court was not called upon to pass upon the question as to apportionment relatively to the time of the accumulation of earnings, since it reached the conclusion that the profits which had been put into the plant had been offset by the depreciation of the plant, and that the "stock dividend" represented not earnings, but an enhancement of the value of the corporate assets from causes other than accumulation of earnings.

In Wilberding v. Miller (Ohio.) supra, the court said that in spite of the irreconcilable differences in the conclusions arrived at on the subject there are a few general propositions as to which there is substantial agreement—among them, that there should be no arbitrary, rigid rule which would prevent the court from looking into the facts and circumstances of each case to determine the rights of the parties according to justice and equity; that the earnings of a corporation are and remain its property until it distributes them among the stockholders; and that, when acting in good faith and for the best interests of all concerned, the corporation may reserve the earnings of a prosperous year to make up for a possible lack of profits in future years, or it may retain possession of its earnings and invest them from time to time in the improvement of its plant and in general betterments.

In Northern Central Dividend Cases (1915) 126 Md. 16, 94 Atl. 338 (disposing of eight appeals involving questions between life tenants and remaindermen over certain extraordinary dividends declared by the Northern Central Railroad Company), it was held as to stock dividends of 12½ and 40 per cent respectively, that it should be determined by agreement or by testimony what part of the accumulations of earnings from which these dividends were declared accrued in the lifetime of any particular testator, and that such part would constitute the corpus going severally to the L.R.A.1916D.

remaindermen, and the balance should be distributed to the life tenants as income.

In Miller v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. (1916) — Md. —, 96 Atl. 766, pursuant to the suggestion in the last case, an agreement was reached and reported in the court below, from which it appeared that the proportion of the earnings which accrued to the company prior to the death of the testator on November 11, 1908, was 77 and a fraction per cent of the whole amount, leaving 22 and a fraction per cent as the proportion which accumulated during the remainder of the ten-year period expiring December 21, 1909; and accordingly it was held that the stock dividend of 40 per cent should be distributed between the corpus and income of the trust in these proportions. It may be observed that this basis of apportionment is not necessarily in conflict with that adopted in the Osborne Case, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 510, on the motion to amend the remittitur, since apparently the 40 per cent dividend was treated as though it exhausted the entire accumulation of earnings for the ten-year period, leaving no balance unexhausted as in the Osborne Case.

In the Miller Case the will directed that if the testator's death should occur prior to January 1, 1911 (the testator died November 11, 1908), the income from the estate until that date should be distributed to an amount not exceeding $8,000 annually to the life beneficiaries, in the proportions specified in the will, and any surplus of income over that amount should be added to the corpus, and that after the date mentioned the whole income should be paid to the tenants for life. It was contended that in view of this provision, the apportionment of the stock dividend should be made, not with reference to the date of the testator's death, but as of the 1st of January, 1911. This contention, however, was rejected. The court said that if the dividend had been declared prior to January 1, 1911, it would have been added to the corpus for the remaindermen in pursuance of the provision of the will requiring such application; but that it was not until three years after 1911 that the resolution for the payment of the dividend was adopted, and that at that time the life tenants were entitled to the whole income from the estate.

In (1915) 166 App. Div. 547, 152 N. Y. Supp. 48 (a later phase of the litigation before the court in Re Osborne, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 510), the court, in adjusting the respective rights of the life tenant and remainderman in the stock dividend, rejected the contention of the trustees that the amount of a cash dividend, declared after the stock dividend was authorized but at the same meeting, should be deducted from the surplus as the basis of the declaration of the stock dividend. The court said that the stock dividend was authorized by the stockholders at a prior special meeting, and in declaring that dividend the directors but carried out the authorization of the stockholders, and when that dividend was declared the transaction was consummated and the rights were vested; that the subsequent declaration of the cash dividend was not to be transferred from its actual order so as to give it an effect qualifying the declaration of the stock dividend. It appears from information furnished by counsel in the case that the reduction of the number of shares going to the life tenant from 999.1 shares awarded by the court of appeals on the amendment of the remittitur to 652.7 shares, as indicated by this report, was not due to any change in the basis or method of apportionment, but to newly discovered evidence, reducing the amount of the surplus accumulated by the corporation after the inception of the life estate.

It was contended in Northern Central Dividend Cases (1915) 126 Md. 16, 94 Atl. 338, that the trustees in the adjustment of the rights between the life tenants and remaindermen should credit to the corpus the excess capital value of the stock over the par value at the date on which the dividend was declared, but the court rejected this view, saying that stock dividends were not based upon the capital value of the stock, but upon the accumulated earnings of the company; that in the declaration of such dividends the capital value is not considered; and that such proportion of the earnings represented by the dividend as accrued during the life tenancy belong to the life tenant.

Regular cash dividends.

The prevailing rule, as shown in the earlier notes, is that, in the absence of statute, regular cash dividends from current earnings are not apportionable.

And so dividends declared after the death of the first life beneficiary from earnings for the year of his death were, in Re Barron (1916) — Wis. —, 155 N. W. 1087, awarded in their entirety to the next life beneficiary, it being expressly held that they were not apportionable. L.R.A. 1916D.

In this case the division of a cash dividend, declared from earnings for the year during which the testator died, between the income and corpus in proportion of the amounts of the earnings before and after his death, was upheld, but the division had been agreed upon by the parties in interest.

Current dividends earned and declared before, but not payable until after, a purchase of stock made by the trustees at the instance of the life tenant, do not go to the life tenant. Re Peel [1910] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 389, 79 L. J. Ch. N. S. 233, 102 L. T. N. S. 67, 26 Times L. R. 227, 54 Sol. Jo. 214.

As to the character of a dividend, so-called, as a cash dividend so far as it depends upon the question whether it represents accumulated earnings or capital, see infra, "Capital or earnings." As to principles and basis of apportionment relatively to the periods covered by the earnings on which the dividend is based, see supra, "Opposing rules, generally; apportionment with respect to time."

The character of an extra dividend as a cash dividend is not affected by the fact that it is payable, at the option of the stockholder, in new stock or in cash. Humphrey v. Lang (1915) 169 N. C. 601 L.R.A. 1916B, 626, 86 S. E. 526. It will be observed that this is in harmony with most of the decisions cited in the earlier notes on this point.

In Mitchell v. Hart (1914) 19 Austr. C. L. 33, the majority of the High Court of Australia (the chief justice dissenting), recognizing the rule established by Bouch v. Sproule (1887) L. R. 12 App. Cas. (Eng.) 385, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1037, 57 L. T. N. S. 345, 36 Week. Rep. 193 (see note in 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 772), which is substantially the same as the Massachusetts rule, held in effect that new shares received by the trustees represented income going to the life tenant rather than capital belonging to the corpus. The corporations in question increased their capital stock and at the same time declared extra dividends of the same amount, and gave shareholders the right to apply the dividend upon the purchase of new shares, there being an additional provision that any premiums received by the corporation upon the sale of new shares should be divided between the shareholders who had not exercised their right of application, pro rata to the number of shares to which they would have been entitled had they made application for the same. The court, however, said that if a disposition is made in such terms and in such surrounding circumstances that the ordinary promptings of human nature would inevitably lead the stockholder to apply his dividend to the purchase of new shares, the distribution would be regarded as capital rather than income; but that the provision in question giving the stockholders the benefit of the premium received by the corporation upon a sale of the stock left a full and free option even from a business standpoint; and that, as neither law nor self-interest could be said to compel the repayment of the profits distributed, they had not been capitalized, and remained income. But for the provision giving the shareholders, who did not apply for new stock, the benefit of premiums realized by the corporation on the sale of that stock, the majority would evidently have agreed with the dissenter that the dividends should be treated as a stock dividend, since the new stock commanded a premium (see in this connection Jones v. Evans [1913] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 23, 107 L. T. N. S. 606, 82 L. J. Ch. N. S. 12, 57 Sol. Jo. 60, 19 Manson, 397, which is set out in the note in 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 516).

In Re Hume (1911) 27 Times L. R. (Eng.) 461, 55 Sol. Jo. 536, a corporation having passed an extraordinary resolution for the division of a special bonus from earnings amounting to 33½ per cent of paid-up capital, and sent to the trustees a conditional allotment letter which conferred upon them the right to receive the dividend in cash or to apply it on shares of £10 each fully paid, and the trustees having elected to take the shares, which were worth about £20 each, it was held that the life tenant was entitled to a charge on the shares for the amount of the par value, the balance to be treated as capital.

In Re Despard (1901) 17 Times L. R. (Eng.) 478, a special dividend received in cash by executors was held to go to the tenant for life as income, notwithstanding that at the same time the special dividend was declared, the company increased its capital by the creation of preference shares and provided that the dividend might be applied to the purchase of such shares, but that any shareholder desiring the special dividend in cash should be so paid, and the preference shares which would have been allotted to him would be disposed of by L.R.A.1916D.

the company as it might think fit. The case was distinguished from Bouch v. Sproule (Eng.) supra, upon the ground that there was no need of any further capital for the operation as was the fact in that case, and that it was open to shareholders to take the dividend in cash, not merely because they had the legal right, but also because the option was deliberately offered to them.

In Re Barron (1916) — Wis. —, 155 N. W. 1087, an extraordinary dividend of 20 per cent was awarded to the income, the court stating that the item was clearly a cash dividend and belonged to the income, notwithstanding that the trustees added a certain amount to it and applied it on the purchase of additional shares of stock in the same bank. It appeared in this case that the earnings between the time the original stock was acquired by the trust and the time the dividend was declared greatly exceeded the amount of the dividend, and there was, therefore, no occasion for apportionment.

In Northern Central Dividend Cases (1915) 126 Md. 16, 94 Atl. 338, extra cash dividends, respectively, of 8 and 10 per cent, declared by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, were held to belong in their entirety to the life tenants irrespective of the time of the accumulation of the earnings from which they were declared. The court quoted from Quinn v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. (1901) 93 Md. 285, 53 L. R. A. 169, 48 Atl. 835, to the effect that "as between successive owners of a share, the dividend belongs to him who is the owner at the time it is declared; and this is true although there is a future day of payment. Such is the rule also when there are successive interests in the same share, as in the case of life tenant and remainderman; there will be no apportionment when the life tenancy expires between dividend days."

The court in Humphrey v. Lang (N. C.) supra, having, as already shown, adopted the Massachusetts rule, awarded an entire cash dividend of 100 per cent to the income, without inquiring as to the time of the accumulation of earnings relatively to the death of the testator.

Stock dividends.

As to principle and basis of apportionment relatively to the periods covered by the earnings upon which the dividend is based, see supra, "Opposing rules, generally; apportionment with respect to time."

As previously shown, the entire amount of a stock dividend declared from earnings which accumulated wholly after the inception of the life estate was awarded to the income in RE HEATON, ante, 201; that court having rejected the Massachusetts rule. And in Northern Central Dividend Cases, supra, the doctrine of apportionment in the event that the earnings from which the stock dividend was declared accumulated partly before and partly after the inception of the life estate is recognized; and is applied in Miller v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. (1916) — Md. —, 96 Atl. 766.

In Re Megrue (1915) 170 App. Div. 653, 155 N. Y. Supp. 1059, it was held that the proportion of stock dividends declared by subsidiaries of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey after the division of the shares owned by that company, which represented earnings since the death of the testator, should be considered as capital.

In Re Bishop (1915) 89 Misc. 355, 151 N. Y. Supp. 768, it was held that extraordinary dividends declared by subsidiary Standard Oil companies should be apportioned between corpus and income in accordance with the principles laid down in the Osborne Case, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 510, notwithstanding an agreement signed by the trustees, by all the life tenants, and by the remaindermen who were of full age,—most of the remaindermen, however, being infants and therefore not joining in the execution of the instrument,—by which it was claimed that the life tenants had surrendered all right to any part of the dividends in question. The agreement in question purported to be a waiver and release by the life tenants of all such dividends that might be declared, and requested that they be deemed a part of the principal of the trust. The purported consideration was the agreement of the trustees, in compliance with the request of the parties, not to sell any of the stock in question until, in the exercise of their discretion, they deemed a sale to be for the benefit of the principal of the trust fund. The court said that the agreement could not be enforced as a contract between remaindermen and life tenants, because that, of the seventeen persons interested as remaindermen, only five signed it, and the instrument, being under seal, could not be enforced by those who were not parties to it; that the agreement of the trustees not to sell the stock until they deemed it for the benefit of the principal of the trust fund to do so furnished no consideration, since it was merely a promise to perform a duty imposed upon them by law; and the want of consideration for the promise of the life tenants rendered the agreement unilateral and unenforceable; that if the instrument were to be construed as an assignment or transfer by the life tenants of their right to a part of the income of the trust fund which had not accrued at the date of the instrument, it would be invalid under § 15 of the Personal Property Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 41), but there were no words of assignment or transfer, the words being merely of release and waiver, and insufficient to constitute a transfer; that the agreement could not be construed as making a valid gift to the remaindermen of that part of the extraordinary dividends which, under the decision of the Osborne Case, would belong to the life tenants, since there were no words of direct gift, and there had been no delivery to the donees of the subject-matter of the gift; and the life tenant could not make a gift of the income which had not accrued at the time of the execution of the instrument, because it would be an attempt to make a gift to take effect in possession in futuro, and such a gift is void.

Stock rights.

As shown in the earlier notes by the weight of authority, a right given by a corporation, whether sold or exercised by taking new stock, belongs to the corpus, and not to the income. That rule is also supported by Lamb v. Lamb (1909) Rap. Jud. Quebec 19 B. R. 49, affirming (1908) Rap. Jud. Quebec 34 S. C. 355.

These notes, however, reveal some authority in support of the view that the stock right belongs to the income, and not to the corpus, where its value depends upon earnings since the inception of the trust, and that it should be apportioned between the corpus and income, where its value depends in part upon earnings that had accumulated before, and in part upon earnings that had accumulated after, that event.

So, in Re Barron (1916) — Wis. —, 155 N. W. 1087, the court said that ordinarily the amount realized by the trustees upon the sale of a stock right should be divided between the corpus and the income in the proportion of the amounts of the surplus and undivided profits at the time the stock was acquired, and at the time of the increase of the stock (citing Holbrook v. Holbrook (1907) 74 N. H. 201, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 768, 66 Atl. 124, see comment in note in 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 811); but there being no showing as to the amount of the increase of the capital stock, or whether it took in all the surplus and undivided profits which existed at the time it was declared, including the surplus and profits existing at the time the trustees purchased their original shares, it was held that there were no sufficient data upon which to make the division, and so the amount realized on the sale of the stock right was treated as an ordinary profit on investment by the trustees, and awarded to the corpus.

In this same case an item realized by trustees on the sale of rights in a bank in which the trustees held stock was awarded to the corpus upon the presumption that it represented good will or other increment to the original capital of the bank, increasing the value of its assets; there being no showing as to whether the bank had any surplus or undivided profits, or as to the amount of its original stock or increase.

Capital or earnings.

As shown in the earlier notes, it may be necessary under any of the opposing rules—even the Massachusetts rule—to determine whether the dividend so-called represents accumulated earnings or capital.

Where the surplus or undivided profits already have been employed in the enlargement of the capital investment of the corporation, and become devoted to its physical plant, then a device to enable the transformation of the assets into stock, obviously for the benefit of the existing stockholders, commonly will be treated as a stock, and not a cash, dividend. Talbot v. Milliken (1915) 221 Mass. 367, 108 N. E. 1060. The court in this case, however, held that the facts (see supra) indicated no liquidation of the corporation; that undoubtedly the dividend was paid in fact out of the accumulated surplus of earnings which had not been used in addition to the permanent investment by the corporation in buildings or other estate to which capital usually is devoted; and added that doubtless if the special dividend had not been declared before the purchase of the stock by the bankers they could have declared a like dividend after securing control of the management; if that had been done, any of the petitioners who had kept their stock could have been under no misapprehension as to the character of the dividend; the time of its declaration cannot make a difference in its nature; the dividend was actually paid in cash; it did not represent any part of the permanent capital of the corporation.

The question whether a cash dividend goes to the income or corpus depends fundamentally upon the question whether it was paid from accumulated surplus or earnings, or out of the capital of the corporation. If it is a payment of earnings, it must be considered as income for the purposes of the trust, although the amount distributed is unusually large and consists partly of shares in another company. Gray v. Hemenway (1916) — Mass. —, 111 N. E. 713.

The court, in determining whether a dividend is a stock or a cash dividend, always looks at the substance of the transaction rather than its form, and does not suffer itself to be trammelled by the names used. If, in its essence, the payment is one out of capital, then it is treated as such, no matter how it may be denominated. But if in truth it is a payment of earnings, then it is deemed income. Talbot v. Milliken (Mass.) supra.

The circumstance that in the vote declaring a special dividend, the payment is referred to as a distribution, and not as a dividend, is of slight consequence, and does not characterize the dividend as a stock dividend rather than a cash dividend. (Mass.) Ibid.

In Gray v. Hemenway (Mass.) supra, a dividend upon common stock, declared by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, on January 8, 1914, of $3 in cash, $12 in preferred stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, charged to profit and loss at the rate of $80 per share, and $22.50 in common stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, charged to profit and loss at $92 per share,—was held to be a cash dividend going, under the Massachusetts rule, to the income. The court expressly overruled the contention of the remaindermen that the portion of the dividend which consisted of Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company stock was a capital asset of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and that the distribution of that stock was a dividend of capital and should be regarded as a part of the corpus of the trust fund. In this connection the court said in effect that the facts indicated that the amount and character of the extra dividend was determined with a view to compensate the stockholders for the contemplated reduction of the regular dividend rate from 10 to 8 per cent, but that it was not a dividend of liquidation or partial liquidation of the capital stock of the corporation, or of capitalized profits used in its business. Dividends declared by one corporation in the stock of another corporation are to be treated as cash dividends for the purposes of the Massachusetts rule.

Dividends, declared by lumber companies whose charter empowered them to acquire and sell timber and timber rights, out of money derived from the conversion of standing timber—in which the capital of the companies had been invested—into lumber and the sale of the manufactured lumber, were held in Washington County Hospital Asso. v. Hagerstown Trust Co. 124 Md. 1, L.R.A. 1915A, 738, 91 Atl. 787, to represent earnings, and not capital. The court said in effect that the dividends in question did not fall within the general principle (formulated in the note in 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 803), that a dividend, so-called, which is not declared from earnings past or present, but which represents a reduction or change of form of capital, or a mere enhancement of the value of assets representing capital from sources other than the accumulation of earnings, belongs to the corpus, and not to the income, but rather that they fell within the exception to that rule as formulated in that note, in respect of corporations whose business is such that it necessarily involves the consumption or change of form of capital.

In Northern Central Dividend Cases (1915) 126 Md. 16, 94 Atl. 338, it was contended upon the one side that the extra dividend declared by the Northern Central Railroad Company represented capital or corpus of the income, and upon the other hand, that the accumulated earnings shown by the company's books and which were represented by the dividends should be augmented by items and additions improperly excluded as income. In the circumstances the court held that it was not required to enter upon an examination and revision of the L.R.A. 1916D.

accounts of the railroad company, but would follow the precedent established by Quinn v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. (1901) 93 Md. 285, 53 L.R.A. 169, 48 Atl. 835, and Atlantic Coast Line Dividend Cases (1905) 102 Md. 73, 61 Atl. 295, 297, 296, and hold the declaration of the company and its stockholders that the dividend represented earnings or income binding upon all parties to the appeals.

In Poole v. Union Trust Co. (1916) — Mich. —, 157 N. W. 430, additional shares of stock received by trustees upon reorganization of corporations in the stock of which funds of the trust were invested, were found to represent merely an enhancement of the value of the corporate assets from causes other than the accumulation of earnings,—apparently due to good management and the growth of trade,—and were accordingly, in harmony with the rule as formulated in the note in 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 803, awarded to the corpus; it appearing that the assets were practically the same at the end of the fiscal year when the testatrix died as they were just prior to the reorganization. It was so held notwithstanding that the directors put the "profits" into buildings and machinery, but subsequently depreciated the same so that the increases disappeared. The court said in effect that the principle applied and the decision reached did not conflict with those decisions which give to the life tenant stock dividends which are the accumulation of earnings invested in improvements or extensions.

Liquidation; merger.

In Wilberding v. Miller (1914) 88 Ohio St. 609, L.R.A. 1916A, 718, 106 N. E. 665, a corporation whose stock had been bequeathed to trustees to hold in trust, with power to sell and reinvest the proceeds, a number of years after the death of the testator, with the consent of all its stockholders, transferred to a new company all its assets, including a surplus which it had accumulated in its business,—a large portion after the death of the testator,—and had invested in its plant, machinery, and other assets used in the business; and each stockholder received two shares in the new company for one in the old company. The court, without expressly adopting the Massachusetts rule, the Pennsylvania rule, or the Kentucky rule, held that the entire stock received by the trustees in the new company belonged to the corpus of the trust fund.

The new company having subsequently gone into liquidation, the court in the same case, upon the authority of Bulkeley v. Worthington Ecclesiastical Soc. (1906) 78 Conn. 526, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 785, 63 Atl. 351, and other cases cited in note in 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 768, awarded the entire distributive share of the assets received by the trustees on the liquidation to the corpus without attempting any analysis of the distribution in respect to its source as between capital or earnings, or as between earnings before and after the death of the testator. The court apparently takes the broad ground that the principles applicable to a dividend declared by a going concern do not apply to a distribution in liquidation; commenting upon the practical impossibility of tracing back all the physical assets to their source, and determining supposed equities between life tenant and remainderman.

Distributions in form of certificates, or bonds of declaring corporation, or stock of another corporation.

A dividend payable in the notes of the declaring corporation rather than in actual money is to be treated as a cash rather than a stock dividend for the purposes of the Massachusetts rule. Boston Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Adams (1914) 219 Mass. 175, 106 N. E. 590.

So that the character as a cash dividend of an extra dividend declared by a bank is not affected by the fact that it is payable in a certificate of deposit in the bank in question. Humphrey v. Lang (1915) 169 N. C. 601, L.R.A.1916B, 626, 86 S. E. 526.

A dividend declared by one corporation payable in the stock of another, assuming that the stock represents earnings and not capital, of the declaring corporation, is a cash, and not a stock, dividend. Gray v. Hemenway (1916) — Mass. —, 111 N. E. 713.

Preferred stock.

A cash dividend declared on preferred stock was, in Boston Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Adams (Mass.) supra, awarded in its entirety to the income without any inquiry as to the time of accumulation of the earnings relatively to the death of the testator, notwithstanding that the dividend included the total amount of past accumulated dividends that might have been declared on the stock. The court said that it was manifest that the right to receive the dividends which had accrued but had not been declared on testator's shares of preferred stock could not have been regarded as constituting a separate part of his estate, or have been made subject to the succession tax; that a purchaser of the stock before the declaration of the dividend would have taken the dividend as the product,—the earnings of the stock; in other words, the right to the dividend did not come into existence until its declaration; that the preferred stockholders, though having the rights of creditors against the common stockholders, are yet not creditors of the corporation.

Where no dividends are paid during the life estate upon stock carrying cumulative preferential dividends, the executors of the life tenant are not entitled to have the arrears made good out of future dividends that may be declared on the stock. Re Sale [1913] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 697, 83 L. J. Ch. N. S. 180, 109 L. T. N. S. 707, 58 Sol. Jo. 220.

In Re Piercy [1907] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 289, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 116, 95 L. T. N. S. 868, 14 Manson, 23, a company in each year from 1894 to 1904 returned to the holders of preferred shares, out of profits available for dividends, various sums, expressed to be paid on account, and in reduction of share capital of the company, in accordance with a resolution passed at a preceding meeting of the company, but without the passage of any further special resolutions until 1905, at which time a special resolution was passed in accordance with the English companies act of 1880 (43 Vict. chap. 19), declaring a return of a specified amount out of accumulated, undivided profits, in reduction of the paid-up capital of the company, and purporting to confirm the returns previously made. It was held that the original resolution had no prospective operation, and that the resolution of 1905 was only valid for that year and invalid so far as it purported to operate retrospectively. Accordingly all the returns except for the year 1905 were held payable as income to the tenants for life, under the doctrine of Bouch v. Sproule (1887) L. R. 12 App. Cas. (Eng.) 385, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1037, 57 L. T. N. S. 345, 36 Week. Rep. 193 (cited in the note in 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 762), and other cases, that a tenant for life is entitled to all dividends made out of profits, except such as have been validly capitalized by the company.

D. M. BROWN

v.

L. B. COOK, Impleaded, etc., Plff. in Err.,

(— W. Va. —, 87 S. E. 454.)

Pleading — amendment — new process.

1. When an action of assumpsit has been remanded to rules with leave to file an amended declaration, and summons issues requiring the defendant to appear and answer a declaration, and an amended declaration is filed, the court may permit the plaintiff to amend the writ at the bar of the court by inserting "amended declaration" in place of the word "declaration," without new process.

For other cases, see Writ and Process, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Bills and notes — non-negotiable note — indorsement — effect.

2. Where a person signs his name in blank on the back of a non-negotiable note before delivery, he may be held as maker or guarantor, at the election of the holder, in the absence of a special agreement. And when the payee seeks to charge such indorser of a non-negotiable note, indorsed before delivery, he must allege that the defendant indorsed the same with intent to become liable as guarantor or maker, according to the fact.

For other cases, see Bills and notes, III. b, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Pleading — declaration on note — charging indorser.

3. In a declaration by a payee on a non-negotiable note, the note is set out in hæc verba, and it is alleged that the note was signed on the back thereof by L. B. C., "whereby the said W. G. C. [the maker] and L. B. C. jointly and as co-obligors agreed to pay," "and being so liable the said W. G. C. and L. B. C., in consideration thereof, on the said 8th day of August, 1907 [the date of said note], undertook and promised the said plaintiff that they would pay him the said sum of $600 [the sum named in the note]." This is a sufficient allegation to charge L. B. C. as joint maker of such note.

For other cases, see Pleading, II. h, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — amendment.

4. Allegations in a declaration may be changed and others added, provided the identity of the cause of action be preserved; but amendments are not allowable which are inconsistent with the nature of the pleadings, or change the cause of action.

For other cases, see Pleading, I. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Trial — former judgment — court.

5. A plea of former judgment on the same cause of action in bar of plaintiff's suit should be tried by the court by an examination and inspection of the record.

For other cases, see Trial, II. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — judgment — effect.

6. A judgment between the same parties upon the same point, which, if pleaded, would have been a perfect bar, is, when used as evidence under the general issue, not conclusive on the jury, but only evidence to be weighed by them.

For other cases, see Evidence, XII. h, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Election — use of former judgment.

7. A defendant has the right to elect whether he will present his defense of former adjudication to plaintiff's suit by way of a special plea of res judicata, or rely upon the defense as evidence on the trial under a plea of the general issue.

For other cases, see Pleading, III. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — record — rejected plea.

8. Where a plea is tendered, and objection thereto is sustained, and an exception is taken, and the record shows the ruling and exception and identifies the plea, such plea is a part of the record.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wyoming County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to hold defendants liable on a certain promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James H. Gilmore, Donald O. Blagg, and M. T. Bowman, for plaintiff in error:

It was error to allow the plaintiff to amend his declaration by substituting a different ground of liability against one of the defendants, electing to hold him as joint maker instead of indorser or guarantor, as alleged in the original declaration.

The declaration was bad for failure to state a consideration, and for failure to aver that the defendant indorsed with intent to become liable as maker.

Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779.

Messrs. Toler & Bailey and Howard & Worrell, for defendant in error:

It is optional with the holder of commercial paper which is signed on the face as maker and on the back as indorser, where the holder of said note is the original payee, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, to hold the person so signing said note as joint maker or co-obligor.

Upon the filing of the plea in abatement, the court may permit the plaintiff to amend his writ or declaration so as to correct the variance, and permit the return to be amended upon such terms as to it shall seem just. Had the defendant taken advantage of the variance, it would have been the duty of the court to permit the amendment to be made, and as to such amendments the courts are liberal.

Every presumption is in favor of the regularity and the upholding of the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Scott v. Newell, 69 W. Va. 118, 70 S. E. 1092.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

D. M. Brown instituted an action of assumpsit against W. G. Cook and L. B. Cook, in the circuit court of Wyoming county. In addition to the common counts, one special count was added. The special count was on a promissory note for $600, executed L.R.A.1916D.

by W. G. Cook to the plaintiff. The name of L. B. Cook was written on the back of the note.

The original declaration alleges: "The said defendant W. G. Cook made and signed his certain note in writing commonly called a promissory note, . . . which promissory note was indorsed by the said L. B. Cook, and by the said W. G. Cook and L. B. Cook delivered to this plaintiff."

The defendant L. B. Cook demurred to this declaration, and leave was given the plaintiff to file an amended declaration at rules or at the bar of the court. The next rule day the plaintiff filed another declaration, with common and special counts. In the special count the note referred to in the first declaration is set out in hoc verba, with the following allegation: "Which said note was signed on the back thereof by said L. B. Cook," etc., "whereby the said W. G. Cook and L. B. Cook jointly and as co-obligors agreed to pay the said plaintiff the further sum of $600," etc.

At the next term of court defendant L. B. Cook appeared and demurred to this amended declaration, for the reason that no process was issued thereon. The demurrer was sustained, and the case was remanded to rules for process. At the next rules, November, 1913, process seems to have been returned; and at the April term, 1914, plaintiff moved to amend process by inserting the words "on amended declaration" after the word "assumpsit" and before the words "damages, $1,000," which motion was sustained, and process accordingly amended, to which defendant L. B. Cook excepted. The defendant W. G. Cook did not appear or contest the plaintiff's demand.

Thereupon defendant L. B. Cook pleaded non assumpsit, and tendered two special pleas,—the first alleging failure of "consideration for the indorsement and execution of said note by this defendant;" the second a plea of res judicata. The plaintiff objected to the filing of these special pleas. The court permitted the filing of the first special plea, and refused the second. Defendant excepted to the ruling of the court in rejecting the second plea. Issue was joined on the plea of non assumpsit and the special plea No. 1. The case was submitted to a jury, and a verdict for the plaintiff for $704.58 was returned. L. B. Cook moved to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial; also to arrest the judgment. These motions were overruled, and judgment was entered against said W. G. Cook and L. B. Cook, to which defendant L. B. Cook excepted.

The evidence is not certified, and this court can consider only such matters as appear upon the face of the record.

The court did not err in permitting the plaintiff to amend the process. The parties all being before the court, there was no necessity for sending the case back to rules for new process.

The original declaration alleged that the note was "indorsed" by defendant L. B. Cook, that is, that he was liable as an indorser; while the amended declaration alleged that his liability was as "co-obligor." The appellant insists that by this amendment the plaintiff "introduced a different cause of action from that originally sued on."

"Amendments are not allowed which are inconsistent with the nature of the pleadings, or change the cause of action. . . . Allegations may be changed, and others added, provided the identity of the cause of action is preserved." Kuhn v. Brownfield, 34 W. Va. 252, 11 L.R.A. 700, 12 S. E. 519; Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 732, 20 S. E. 696.

The amendment in this case is not of such nature as to change the cause of action.

Defendant claims that the declaration is defective in not showing the intent of L. B. Cook in writing his name on the back of the note. It is conceded that he might be held either as maker or guarantor according to the fact, but it is insisted that the declaration must show in what capacity the defendant is liable,—whether as maker or guarantor. No doubt, this view is correct as to liability on a non-negotiable note.

"Where a person puts his name in blank on the back of a promissory note, he may be held liable as maker or guarantor, when there is an agreement to that effect, and when he cannot be charged as an indorser, as in the case of a non-negotiable note. But where the payee seeks to charge the indorser of a non-negotiable note, who indorsed the same before delivery, with the payment thereof, he must allege that the defendant indorsed with intent to become liable as guarantor or maker. This is allowed in order to prevent an entire failure of the contract, on the principle, 'Ut res magis valeat quam pereat.'" Edwards, Bills & Notes, § 391, quoted in Young v. Schon, 53 W. Va. 127, 62 L.R.A. 499, 97 Am. St. Rep. 970, 44 S. E. 136.

We think this rule has been complied with in the case at bar. The declaration avers that the note was signed on the back thereof by L. B. Cook, "whereby the said W. G. Cook and L. B. Cook, jointly and as co-obligors, agreed to pay," etc. "And being so liable the said W. G. Cook and L. B. Cook, in consideration thereof, on the 8th day of August, 1907 [the date of L.R.A.1916D.

the said note], undertook and promised the said plaintiff that they would pay him the said sum of $600," etc. Clearly this is an averment charging L. B. Cook as an obligor.

The defendant L. B. Cook tendered and asked leave to file a special plea of res judicata. Counsel for defendant in error objects to the consideration of this plea for the reason that the same was not made part of the record. It is true that the order of the court simply shows that it was tendered. There was no order filing, or formally making it a part of the record by bill of exceptions or order of the court. Pleas tendered by a defendant in an action at law and rejected by the court are not parts of the record, unless made so by bill of exceptions or some appropriate order of the court. This court said in the case of Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158, 31 Am. Rep. 757: "If a rejected plea is by order of the court made a part of the record, and the order book shows that its rejection was excepted to, the supreme court of appeals will review the action of the court in rejecting such plea, though no formal bill of exceptions was taken to the rejection of such plea."

Judge Green, in delivering the opinion of the court in Sweeney v. Baker, said: "When the court makes the order that the pleas are rejected, and the rejection of them is excepted to by the defendants, such entry could be made by the court only to give to the defendants the power to have reviewed the decision of the court in rejecting the pleas. Of course, this purpose of the court would be idle unless the plea was thereby intended to be made a part of the record. For, of course, no exception could be taken to what constituted no part of the record. And it does seem to me we would be too technical if an entry which the court who made it considered, and must have considered, as the equivalent of an order directing the rejected plea to be made a part of the record, should be disregarded simply because it did not say in express words the rejected plea is ordered to be made a part of the record."

This question is fully discussed in National Valley Bank v. Houston, 66 W. Va. 336, 66 S. E. 465, and this court decided in that case: "Though an exception of defendant to a ruling on a special plea tendered be not contained in any order entered in the court below, yet, if it be shown in the certificate of evidence, or in any other part of the record, the defendant may avail himself here of any error in rejecting such plea."

In the case at bar the defendant asked leave to file the special plea, and had it marked for identification "special plea No. 2," and the order of the court shows the objection by the plaintiff to the filing of the same, the rejection of the plea tendered, and that the defendant at the time excepted to the ruling of the court refusing the filing of the plea. This is equivalent to a formal order making the rejection of the plea a part of the record. The ruling of the court below is subject to review by the appellate court.

The refusal of the court to permit the defendant to file the plea of res judicata is error for which the case will have to be reversed. True, the defendant had pleaded non assumpsit, and under this plea might have shown a former judgment, but there is a very clear distinction between the two methods of presenting the defense. The advantage of a special plea of res judicata is that it is a perfect bar to plaintiff's case where the judgment pleaded is between the same parties and upon the same point, but when used as evidence under the general issue, it would not be conclusive. It would only be evidence to be weighed by the jury; "the doctrine being that, though the party is estopped if the matter be pleaded, yet the jury, upon the general issue, are not estopped, but must find their verdict upon the whole evidence in the case, and may find against the former judgment." Cleaton v. Chambliss, 6 Rand. (Va.) 95. The plea of res judicata must be tried by the court upon an examination and inspection of the record. Davis v. Trump, 43 W. Va. 191, 64 Am. St. Rep. 849, 27 S. E. 397. The defendant had the right to elect whether he would make defense under the special plea or submit the case on the general issue.

For reasons stated above, we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, overrule the objection to special plea No. 2, and remand the case.

Such a writing by a third party whether the paper be negotiable or non-negotiable is called an "irregular indorsement."

The examination of this subject, like most others in bills and notes, is attended with great difficulty on account of the inveterate reluctance of the reporters to give us a copy of the note. Many cases have been disregarded in this note which may be of actual authority because it was impossible to say whether the note was negotiable or non-negotiable. Nor has it been considered worth while in general to mention cases excluded on this account.

It is the general rule that the actual intent of the parties may be shown, and if shown it will be carried out. If the evidence shows, however, merely an indorsement before delivery to give credit to the paper, this, by the weight of authority, imports an engagement as original promisor or guarantor. If there is no evidence, there is considerable difference of opinion, some of the courts holding in such case that no contract at all is imported. In some cases the matter is governed by special statute.

Some of the technical expressions used by the courts in relation to this subject have various meanings in different jurisdictions; this is particularly so of "guarantor." In fact, it is often difficult to see just what meaning the court in a particular case is giving to "surety," "guarantor," "warrantor," or even "indorser," and in general the cases are not of much value outside the jurisdiction where they were decided unless it is clear just what the court does mean by the use of these expressions.

For liability of a stranger who indorses commercial paper in general before delivery, see the note to Fullerton v. Hill, 18 L.R.A. 33.

For the question as to the law of what place covers the case of irregular indorsement, see the notes to Spies v. National City Bank, 61 L.R.A. 200, and to Sykes v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 668.

For character under uniform negotiable instruments law, of one who places his name on the back of a note prior to or at the time of delivery, see the note to Rockfield v. First Nat. Bank 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 842.

For conditional execution of contract under a parol agreement that it shall not take effect until others have signed it, see the note to Benton County Sav. Bank v. Boddicker, 45 L.R.A. 321.

II. What irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper imports.

a. In general.

The import of the irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper varies much in different jurisdictions.

Alabama.

Here the irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper imports the same contract as to the indorsee as in the case of negotiable notes, except that the indorsee must aver and prove the exercise of the diligence required by the statute as to non-negotiable notes, to first endeavor to collect from the maker, and a failure to do so or an excuse for not doing so. Bank of Luverne v. Sharp (1907) 152 Ala. 589, 126 Am. St. Rep. 58, 44 So. 871, holding that the indorser could not complain of failure of consideration in a suit against him by a purchaser from the payee. The court said: "We are disposed to follow the line of decisions holding that the indorser of a note not negotiable is liable to the indorsee to the same extent as the indorser of a negotiable note (Byles, Bills, 146, and note; Jones v. Fales (1808) 4 Mass. 245; Sanger v. Stimpson (1811) 8 Mass. 260), the only distinction being, not as to extent of liability, but as to the action of the indorsee to fasten the liability after default by the maker. In case of negotiable notes, there must be protest and notice, if not waived, and in case of non-negotiable notes, when the indorsee seeks to recover against the indorser, he must aver and prove the exercise of the diligence required by the statute to first collect from the maker, and a failure to do so or an excuse for not doing so. . . . In fact, our statutes upon this subject seem to have been enacted upon the theory that the extent of the liability of the indorser of a non-negotiable note is the same as that of the indorser of one that is negotiable, and prescribe the steps to be taken in order to fasten the liability as to the former, because not subject to protest and notice, in case of default by the maker. . . . We do not understand that the effect of the indorsement, which was made before maturity, merely rendered the indorser liable to a purchaser for value in the event the maker had no defense to the note. The indorsement was, in effect, a guaranty to a purchaser for value before maturity of the payment of the note if not made out of the maker, and was in no sense subject to all defenses that could be made by the maker against the collection of same. The note purported to be for a valuable consideration, and the indorsement cannot be held to be without consideration and of no effect, because of a subsequent failure of the payee to deliver the thing, the price for which the note was given." It does not appear whether the indorsement was made before delivery.

California.

The irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper imports an absolute undertaking to pay the paper as a "guarantor" as defined in the California statute (see First Nat. Bank v. Babcock, 94 Cal. 96, 29 Am. St. Rep. 94, 29 Pac. 415, infra, III.) Rogers v. Schulenburg (1896) 111 Cal. 281, 43 Pac. 899, holding that where a third party wrote his name on the back of a non-negotiable note, whether before or after delivery, he became a guarantor, and that it was not necessary that the consideration be expressed in writing; that therefore as against him it was sufficient to plead his indorsement. It did not appear whether the indorsement was made before or after delivery.

Connecticut (prior to the statute of 1884).

The irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper imports a contract by the indorser that the note is due and payable according to its tenor; that the maker shall be of ability to pay it on maturity, and that it shall be collectable by the use of due diligence. Huntington v. Harvey (1821) 4 Conn. 124; Perkins v. Catlin (1836) 11 Conn. 213, 29 Am. Dec. 282 (obiter); Ranson v. Sherwood (1857) 26 Conn. 437; Spencer v. Allerton (1891) 60 Conn. 410, 13 L.R.A. 806, 22 Atl. 778 (obiter).

But where a note read, We, A and B, as principal, and C and D surety, promise to pay P. or order, etc., and was signed A and B and indorsed C and D, it was held that the writing imported one original entire transaction, and the indorsers were considered as makers, that is, as joint promisors with the principal. Palmer v. Grant (1822) 4 Conn. 389. This case was construed in Perkins v. Catlin (1836) 11 Conn. 213, 29 Am. Dec. 282, infra, III., as not altering the general Connecticut rule.

Indiana.

The irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper imports a contract of suretyship if indorsed before delivery.

In Wells v. Jackson (1841) 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 40, the court had under consideration an assignable bond, and stated that by the local statute it was of the character of mercantile paper. The court there, after referring to cases in Massachusetts, New York, and England, said: "The deduction which we draw from these authorities is that the blank indorsement of nonnegotiable paper, made at the date of the contract and unexplained by extrinsic testimony, confers upon the payee the authority to hold the indorser liable on the original contract, as a surety; and that a similar unexplained indorsement of negotiable paper renders the indorser liable only as indorser, with the ordinary rights and privileges incident to that character. But that in either case the liability designed to be assumed, and the authority intended to be given by the indorsement, may be explained by the attendant circumstances, and the prima facie responsibility be changed into one of another kind. And this appears to us to be also the common-sense view of the subject."

The placing of one's signature on the back of a non-negotiable note, by a person not the payee, at or prior to the time of its inception, without making an express contract defining the nature and extent of his undertaking, renders such person liable as a surety or joint promisor, and a stipulation in such note waiving notice of nonpayment is immaterial. Pool v. Anderson (1888) 116 Ind. 88, 1 L.R.A. 712, 18 N. E. 445.

Missouri.

The irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper imports a contract as original promisor. Powell v. Thomas, 7 Mo. 440, 38 Am. Dec. 465; Kuntz v. Tempel (1871) 48 Mo. 71 (obiter).

In Powell v. Thomas (Mo.) supra, a non-negotiable note was indorsed by the defendants, it not appearing when the indorsement was made, and it was held that they were liable as original promisors, the court saying inter alia: "The case of Baker v. Briggs, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 122, 19 Am. Dec. 311, is an authority to show that where the contrary does not appear, it will be presumed that the execution of the note and the making the indorsement were contemporaneous acts. The party making the indorsement is regarded as being privy to the consideration; and it will be presumed that it was taken on the faith of the indorsement, and he will not be heard in objecting the want of consideration for his indorsement. This we hold is the light in which a blank indorsement made by a party who is not the payee of a note is to be regarded, if nothing to the contrary appears. The real contract of the parties may be shown; but in the absence of all proof, the foregoing are the principles by which we think courts should be governed in determining the liability of a party who, when not a payee or indorsee, will make a blank indorsement on a promissory note." In the Briggs Case the note seems to have been negotiable.

In Kuntz v. Tempel (Mo.) supra, where we are perhaps to suppose that the note was negotiable, the court said: "The settled law in regard to this matter is that, if the note be negotiable in form, and made so in fact by the indorsement of the payee, then all other indorsers, unless the contrary be stipulated, are held as such; but if the note be non-negotiable, or be not indorsed by the payee, then, in the absence of an express agreement, the original indorsers are to be treated as makers."

Ohio.

There is an obiter statement that the irregular indorsement of non-negotiable paper imports a contract of "guaranty" in Champion v. Griffith (1844) 13 Ohio, 228, where the payee of a negotiable note sued the maker and a third party who indorsed it as joint and several makers, and the court, in refusing to set aside a nonsuit, said that they held "that the mere indorsement upon a note, of a stranger's name in blank, is prima facie evidence of guaranty. To charge such person as a maker, there must be proof that his indorsement was made at the time of the execution by the other party, or, if afterwards, that it was in pursuance of an agreement or intention that he should become responsible from the date of the execution. Such agreement or intention may be proved by parol. The rule is the same whether the instrument be negotiable or not."

b. Special statutes.

Some of the cases have been decided under special statutes.

Thus, in Picket v. Hawes (1862) 14 Iowa, 460, where it did not appear whether or not the indorser of a non-negotiable note had indorsed it before delivery, it was held that under the Iowa Code the blank indorsement of an instrument for the payment of money by a person not a payee, indorsee, or assignee thereof, shall be deemed a guaranty of the performance of the contract, and that to charge him notice of nonpayment by the principal must be given within a reasonable time; but the guarantor is chargeable without notice if the holder shows affirmatively that the guarantor had received no detriment from want of notice, and in the case, as he showed no want of detriment he could not be held, this being a demand note.

In Krachts v. Obst (1878) 14 Bush (Ky.) 34, where the indorsers had indorsed before delivery, the court held that the statute of Kentucky, as herein-after quoted, was applicable, but it does not otherwise appear whether the note was or was not negotiable. The statute provided that "every person who shall sign his name upon the back of a promissory note shall be deemed and treated as an assignor as to the party holding it, unless in writing a different purpose be expressed; or the note can be legally placed on the footing of a bill of exchange."

In Williams v. Obst (1876) 12 Bush (Ky.) 266, where it does not appear when the indorsement was made with respect to delivery, the court stated: "The fact that the note might have been negotiated at one of the chartered banks of this commonwealth or at a national bank located in this state, and thereby placed on the footing of a bill of exchange, does not take it out of the operations of the statute. The holder of the note did not negotiate it, and at the time of the institution of this action it could not have been placed on the footing of a bill of exchange."

In Dotson v. Owsley (1911) 141 Ky. 452, 132 S. W. 1037, A made a promissory note to B and before its delivery to B, C and D indorsed it. It was held that the indorsers were liable simply as assignors under the foregoing statute, the note being executed before the negotiable instruments law was in force. The court said: "As the note in question was not payable at any bank in this commonwealth, and actually discounted by that bank or some other bank in this commonwealth, it was not placed upon the footing of a bill of exchange; therefore under the express terms of the section of the statute referred to, Dotson and Stanley were liable merely as assignors."

The statutes of Connecticut of 1884 were before the court in the case of a negotiable note in Spencer v. Allerton (1891) 60 Conn. 410, 13 L.R.A. 806, 22 Atl. 778, where the court said: "In the year 1884 the legislature passed the following act: 'The blank indorsement of a negotiable or a non-negotiable note, by a person who is neither its maker nor its payee, before or after the indorsement of such note by the payee, shall import the contract of an ordinary indorsement of negotiable paper as between such indorser and the payee or subsequent holders of such paper.' Gen. Stat. § 1860. Before the passage of this act, . . . the blank indorsement of either a negotiable or a non-negotiable note by a stranger to the note implied, prima facie, a contract on the part of the indorser that the note was due and payable according to its tenor; that the maker should be of ability to pay it when it came to maturity; and that it was collectable by the use of due diligence.

. . . The statute was doubtless intended to deliver our law from its anomalous position, and bring it into harmony with the law merchant as it is interpreted in the great commercial centers of our country with which we are connected in business transactions involving the daily exchange of notes, bills, and all manner of negotiable securities. . . . Under it, it is at once apparent that the blank indorsement of a negotiable or non-negotiable note by a person who is neither its maker nor payee, whether before or after its indorsement by the payee, no longer imports a contract that the indorser will pay the note if, on the use of due diligence, it is not collected of the maker. It is no longer a contract of guaranty. But it imports, as between such indorser and the payee, or subsequent holders thereof, a contract of an ordinary indorsement of negotiable paper, which is, by the law merchant, a contract for payment conditioned on due presentment to the maker for payment and due notice of dishonor."

In Smith v. Myers (1904) 207 Ill. 126, 69 N. E. 858, the court held that the Connecticut statute as to the blank indorsement of a negotiable or non-negotiable note by a person not its maker or its payee did not apply to an instrument which was not a promissory note and which was delivered in Connecticut.

In this connection it may be noted that in Cook v. Googins (1879) 126 Mass. 410, which related to a negotiable note, it was held that notes made before it were not subject to the Massachusetts statute of 1874, chap. 404, providing that "all persons becoming parties to promissory notes payable on time, by a signature in blank on the back thereof, shall be entitled to notice of the nonpayment thereof, the same as indorsers."

Some of the cases hold that the indorsement imports no contract.

No contract is implied by the irregular indorsement of a non-negotiable note without explanation. Lang v. Fegenbush (1856) 2 Phila. (Pa.) 20, infra, IV.

In Jackson v. Slipper (1869) 19 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 640, it was claimed that a declaration on a non-negotiable note of which the plaintiff was the payee and the defendant an indorser was one by payee against maker, there being no evidence except that of the defendant's signature. It was held that a nonsuit was right as, the paper not being negotiable, defendant could not be charged as "indorsee," and in the absence of proof he was not to be held as maker.

In Abecomb Bldg. & L. Soc. v. Leeds (1888) 50 N. J. L. 399, 5 L.R.A. 353, 18 Atl. 82, it was held that where a non-negotiable note was indorsed by third parties before delivery to the payee, an action would not lie against such indorsers simply upon the production of the note, on the ground that it had already been held in New Jersey in the case of negotiable notes that it must be shown by other testimony what the purpose of the indorsement was, and the court did not consider that there should be any distinction made between the two classes of notes. In the absence of evidence the action must fail. Four judges dissented.

In Smith v. Myers (1904) 107 Ill. App. 410, where two third parties had indorsed a non-negotiable instrument (apparently before delivery), one of them sued the other and a verdict was directed for defendant. On appeal it was held that, as the instrument was not a promissory note, no contract was implied from the signing by the defendant of his name upon the back of the paper. The court said: "No consideration for the indorsement of this paper by appellee was shown, nor did appellant prove or offer to prove any state of facts from which would arise an undertaking by appellee to indemnify appellant in whole or in part for the payment made by him to the holder of said paper. . . . The condition which appellant offered and was not permitted to show appears to have been that he, appellant, refused to indorse the paper until someone else had indorsed it. The instrument under consideration not being a promissory note, had appellant shown all that he offered to, he would not have established any valid contract upon the part of appellee to indemnify him for the payment he L.R.A.1916D.

made upon the instrument." On appeal, in (1903) 207 Ill. 126, 69 N. E. 858, the court in affirming the judgment said: "Upon a mere contract for the payment of money or the performance of any other covenant, where the instrument is not such as comes within the definition of a negotiable instrument, one by merely signing his name upon the back thereof does not become either a guarantor or an indorser, within the law merchant. There are many instruments that may be transferred by assignment of the holder or payee, and which are sometimes called negotiable instruments, such as bills of lading, warehouse receipts, and other assignable contracts, for the performance of the terms or covenants of which one may become a guarantor; but the contract of guaranty on such instrument will not arise by the mere signing of the name of a person not a party thereto on the back thereof."

In Johnston v. McDonald (1894) 41 S. C. 81, 19 S. E. 65, it was held that there must be proof that indorsement was before delivery. Thus, where a note was made by A, payable to B, and C had written his name across the back of it, the payee's assignee could not recover of C without showing that C's indorsement was made at or before the delivery of the note to the payee, that is, that it was a part of the original transaction. The court said: "There can be no doubt that the authorities cited by the counsel for appellant conclusively show that a third person may, under certain circumstances, make himself liable, as one of the original makers, on a note signed by one person, payable to another, by simply writing his name across the back of a note, whether it be negotiable in form, or unnegotiable, as the note here in question is, inasmuch as it is not payable to order or to bearer."

In this connection reference may be made to the two following Canadian cases:

In West v. Bown (1847) 3 U. C. Q. B. 290, the plaintiff declared in assumpsit on a note as made by a third party payable to the plaintiff, and that the defendant indorsed the same to the plaintiff. It was demurred that the plaintiff did not show in his declaration any right of action against the defendant, the note being payable to plaintiff, and not to his order, and consequently not a negotiable instrument. The chief justice said that it was impossible to hold that any right of action was stated in the declaration, unless they could hold that anyone, by indorsing a note not negotiable made payable to another, renders himself liable to that other, and may be sued as indorser. He also said that the action was not against the defendant as a new maker of the note, independently of any rights to be derived through the payee, but an action by the payee against the defendant as indorser upon a note not negotiable, yet treating the defendant as indorser. Macaulay, J., seems to intimate in his opinion that the defendant would not have been liable as maker. (In McMurray v. Talbot (U. C.) infra, it is stated that the note in the West Case "was apparently a negotiable promissory note," the court in the McMurray Case apparently having not looked carefully at the report of the West Case.)

In McMurray v. Talbot (1856) 5 U. C. C. P. 157, where B sued C on a promissory non-negotiable note made by A to B and indorsed by C, it is stated that the fact was that the note was at the same time indorsed in blank by the defendant as a surety for the maker, it being intended that he should be bound to the parties of such note. The plaintiff contended that he was liable as maker and a verdict was found for plaintiff subject to that point, and it was ordered that there must be a nonsuit. In this case, Macaulay, Ch. J., said that "West v. Bown (U. C.) supra, was apparently a negotiable promissory note, in which the defendant was sued by the payee as indorser, and on demurrer judgment was given for the defendant. In this case I said I could not find whether Thew v. Adams decided that a party indorsing his name on the back of a promissory note, or if so, not indorsed by the payee, could be made responsible to the payee as a maker or indorser or guarantor." From the earlier reference of this judge in the opinion to the unreported case of Thew v. Adams, it seems that there the note was negotiable, but the reference to it in the West Case is somewhat ambiguous.

III. What such indorsement before delivery to give credit imports.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that an indorsement of non-negotiable paper before delivery to give credit or security imports the liability of an original promisor. Wetherwax v. Paine (1853) 2 Mich. 555; Rothschild v. Grix (1875) 31 Mich. 150, 18 Am. Rep. 171 (obiter); Powell v. Thomas (1842) 7 Mo. 440, 38 Am. Dec. 465; Kuntz v. Tempel (1871) 48 Mo. 71 (obiter); Barr v. Mitchell (1879) 7 Or. 346; D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Hubbard (1891) 20 Or. L.R.A. 1916D.

318, 11 L.R.A. 833, 25 Pac. 1021; Lumberman's Nat. Bank v. Campbell (1912) 61 Or. 123, 121 Pac. 427 (not necessary to decision); Cockrell v. Milling (1847) 1 Strobh. L. (S. C.) 444; Sylvester Bleckley Co. v. Alewine (1897) 48 S. C. 308, 37 L.R.A. 86, 26 S. E. 609; Houghton v. Ely (1870) 26 Wis. 181, 7 Am. Rep. 52; Gorman v. Ketchum (1873) 33 Wis. 427; Piers v. Hall (1878) 18 N. B. 34. See also Roe v. Hallett (1884) 34 Hun (N. Y.) 128, and Paine v. Noelke (1877) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 333, 11 Jones & S. 176, infra.

In Sylvester Bleckley Co. v. Alewine (1897) 48 S. C. 308, 37 L.R.A. 86, 26 S. E. 609, where a non-negotiable note was made payable to the order of blank, and was indorsed by two third parties before delivery, for the purpose of credit for the maker with the person to whom the note was delivered, it was held that his assignee could recover of the indorsers as joint makers with the maker of the note.

In Houghton v. Ely (1870) 26 Wis. 181, 7 Am. Rep. 52, the payee sued the indorser of a non-negotiable instrument, alleging that the indorsement was made before delivery, and in effect that the purpose of the indorsement was to give the maker credit with the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff conveyed to the maker certain property, it being a condition of this conveyance or delivery that the defendant should be holden for the price. The point particularly discussed was the question of the statute of frauds, and it was held that the indorser was liable as maker.

Where A made a non-negotiable note to the plaintiff, and B indorsed it before delivery, and the complaint averred that the defendant in question indorsed the note at the time it was made and the plaintiff paid the consideration for the note on the credit of such indorsement, and that he so indorsed it for the purpose of procuring for the maker a credit with the plaintiff was sufficient to hold such indorser as an original promisor. Gorman v. Ketchum (1878) 33 Wis. 427. The court stated that, the note not being negotiable, the indorser "cannot be held liable on the note as an indorser, but only (if at all) as an original promisor."

In Kidd v. Beckley (1908) 64 W. Va. 80, 60 S. E. 1089, where A made a non-negotiable note to the order of the plaintiff, which was indorsed by the defendant, and the plaintiff sued the maker and the indorser as joint makers, it was held that it was not necessary for the complaint to set up the fact of indorsements before delivery, as that was an evidential fact which might be proven under a declaration charging such indorser as maker. It was also held in the same case that an agreement between the indorser and the maker, that the note should not be delivered until other indorsers had been secured, was of no avail against the payee unless he was shown to have known of it at the time. The case, however, was reversed on other grounds.

It does not seem clear that there is any direct authority on the question in Massachusetts prior to the statute of 1874 (see Cook v. Googins (1879) 126 Mass. 410, supra, II. b), unless it be Cherry v. Sprague (Mass.) infra.

In Moies v. Bird (1814) 11 Mass. 436, 6 Am. Dec. 179, however, while the note appears to be negotiable, the defendant is represented as having stated to a witness that it was not a negotiable note, and it was stated by counsel in the case of Sumner v. Gay (1826) 4 Pick. (Mass.) 311, that the note in Moies v. Bird "was erroneously described in the report as being payable to order."

In Moies v. Bird (Mass.) supra, the plaintiff brought an action on a note made to him or his order signed by B., the defendant's name being signed in blank upon the back of said note. It was admitted that the defendant's name was not signed on the note until after its delivery, but it was claimed to have been done under an agreement or in furtherance of an arrangement that had been made before the delivery, as to which the court said: "If it was a fact that his signature was in consequence of the purchase made by his brother, upon representations made that he would sign the note, although his signing was not until after the delivery of the deed, his act ought to be referred to the date of the transactions, and he must be presumed, when he signed in blank, to have assented to such a reference; so that he would be considered, in law, as well as justice, as having placed his name on the note at the time it bears date, if that be necessary to give effect to his engagement;" and it was held that the effect of the indorsement was to make the defendant absolutely liable to pay the note.

In Re Wrentham Mfg. Co. (1872) 2 Low. Dec. 119, Fed. Cas. No. 18,063, where it was not essential to the result, the court, referring to the indorsement by a third party of a non-negotiable receipt, said: "The doctrine is firmly established in Massachusetts, that an indorsement of this sort, made by one who is not the payee of a note, and made before the note is negotiated, binds the indorser as an original promisor. The cases are reviewed in Union Bank v. Willis (1844) 8 Met. (Mass.) 504, 41 Am. Dec. 541. . . . Most of the cases are of negotiable notes; but I do not see why the rule is not equally applicable to notes which are not negotiable, because it is on the very ground that the signature on the back of a note, by one who is not payee or indorsee, is not a strict indorsement; that they give it effect as a promise." But it was held in the case that the payee had no right to assume that the agent of a corporation had authority thus by indorsement to pledge the credit of the corporation for a matter of this kind.

In Cherry v. Sprague (1904) 187 Mass. 113, 67 L.R.A. 33, 105 Am. St. Rep. 381, 72 N. E. 456, the court expressly declined to pass upon the question whether the note was negotiable or not; it was made to the order of C, and indorsed by A, B, and C, A being the defendant, and it was held that "by the law of this state, aside from statutory enactments, a third person placing his name on the back of a promissory note before delivery to the payee is an original promisor or maker, not entitled to have demand or notice of nonpayment, and that as to him no consideration need be proved." It would appear from this decision that the court makes no distinction between negotiable and non-negotiable instruments.

In New York it is usual to say that the indorser under such circumstances may be held liable as "maker or guarantor," but it is not entirely clear just what the courts have here intended by "guarantor," and it would seem doubtful, from the leading case of Richards v. Warring (1864) 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 47, 1 Keyes, 576, infra, IV., whether the court means anything more by "maker or guarantor" than "maker" or an original promisor.

In Griswold v. Slocum (1851) 10 Barb. (N. Y.) 402, the defendant indorsed before delivery a non-negotiable note to the plaintiffs, who alleged a demand and refusal of payment and notice to the defendant, who was held liable as maker or grantor. The court said: "It is now held that when the paper is negotiable, the party indorsing it as security before delivery to the payee can be held liable only as indorser, and is entitled to notice of protest, after demand made of the maker. The reason why this is not the law in regard to paper not negotiable is to prevent an entire failure of justice. Ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Not being liable as indorser, if he cannot be held responsible as maker or guarantor, the party escapes all accountability on his contract. The distinction in this respect between paper negotiable and not negotiable has been plainly recognized, and is now well established. All the conflict of authority has been in regard to negotiable paper. There has been none in regard to paper not negotiable."

In McMullen v. Rafferty (1882) 89 N. Y. 456, the plaintiff sued the defendant on a demand note made by a third party to the plaintiff without negotiable words, and indorsed by the defendant, the action being commenced more than six years after the date of it, and it was held that it was barred by the statute of limitations; that as the note was a non-negotiable note, the defendant did not in a commercial sense become an indorser of it with the rights and liabilities of a simple indorser, but he could be held as maker of the note or guarantor of its payment, and that in the case of a note payable on demand the statute of limitations begins to run in favor of the maker from its date, and as the defendant could at all times be treated as the maker of the note, the cause of action must be deemed to have accrued against him at the date of the note, and that this was so although the plaintiff had the option also to treat him as a guarantor, as the same result would follow in that case.

But in Cawley v. Costello (1878) 15 Hun (N. Y.) 303, where the plaintiff sued the maker of a non-negotiable note to the plaintiff, and also the indorser of such note, alleging demand and notice, it was held that the complaint was demurrable; that the writing by the defendant of his name on the back of the note was not an indorsement, the note being non-negotiable, and that such defendant could be held liable only as maker or guarantor; that to hold him as such it must be averred that he wrote his name on the back of the note with intent to become liable thereon in such character. This case is criticized in New York Security & T. Co. v. Storm (1894) 81 Hun 33, 30 N. Y. Supp. 605,—infra, IV., where the court states that it was probably not intended in the Cawley Case to assert in effect that the so-called indorser understood the legal relation which he wanted to assume toward the other parties to the note, and therefore signed it with intent to become liable thereon as comaker or surety to the maker, as the case might be, for if such a meaning was intended it was error.

that such indorsement imports the liability of a maker. Paine v. Noelke (1877) 54 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 333, 11 Jones & S. 175.

In Roe v. Hallett (1884) 34 Hun (N. Y.) 128, where a third party indorsed a non-negotiable promissory note before delivery, it was held that the complaint properly charged him as the maker.

Probably in BROWN v. COOK, ante, 220, the court uses the expression "maker or guarantor" in the same general way as it is used in the New York cases.

In California the import is that of guaranty as defined in the statute. Thus, where a third party before delivery wrote his name on the back of a non-negotiable note to give it security, he was held to be liable as a guarantor. First Nat. Bank v. Babcock (1892) 94 Cal. 96, 29 Am. St. Rep. 94, 29 Pac. 415, where the court said: "What is now the liability, in this state, of a guarantor? As we have seen, a guaranty is a promise to answer for the debt of another person, and it may be enforced, upon default of the principal, without any previous demand or notice. It is an absolute undertaking to pay the whole debt if the principal does not, and no mere delay of the creditor to proceed against the principal, or to enforce any other remedy, can be availed of as a defense. And such a liability is assumed prima facie, when, as in this case, the guarantor writes his name on the back of a non-negotiable note to give it credit."

In Connecticut, prior to the statute of 1884 (see II. b, supra), a peculiar doctrine prevailed.

In Bradly v. Phelps (1796) 2 Root (Conn.) 325, where a third party indorsed on the refusal of the payee to lend without an indorser, it was held that this was an engagement that the payee should be able to obtain the money from the maker on maturity, and not one that the note should be paid at all events.

In Huntington v. Harvey (1821) 4 Conn. 124, an action by the payee of a non-negotiable note against a third party who had indorsed the same in blank before delivery, the jury were instructed that the defendant's undertaking was collateral, and not direct. In declining to set aside the verdict for misdirection the court said: "By uniform and long-continued usage in this state, as well as by repeated determinations, a blank indorsement on a note not negotiable contains a warranty that the note is due; that the maker shall be of ability to pay it when it reaches maturity; and that it shall be collectable by the use of due diligence.

Bradly v. Phelps (Conn.) supra; Swift, Ev. 342; Williams v. Granger (1810) 4 Day (Conn.) 444. The holder may not write over the indorser's name a direct and absolute promise, nor insert any special contract repugnant to the nature of a blank indorsement as it has always been understood; for it is not to be presumed that the assignor, by an indorsement in blank, intended anything more than a power of attorney with warranty, accompanied by a transfer of the money when collected. . . . The diligence before mentioned requires that the contents of the note shall be demanded of the maker so soon as it falls due, and if it be not paid, that it shall immediately be put in suit against him by attachment. On failure of this, the indorser is released from his responsibility." It should be noted that it is stated in Palmer v. Grant (1822) 4 Conn. 389, that in Huntington v. Harvey (Conn.) supra, the indorser placed his name in blank on the note long after it was made, which is certainly contrary to the statement of the court in the Huntington Case, for the court there says: "Augustus Bushnell made his promissory note to the plaintiff, the same not being negotiable, and procured the defendant to indorse it in blank. In this condition it was delivered to the plaintiff."

In Perkins v. Catlin (1836) 11 Conn. 213, 29 Am. Dec. 282, the note was a negotiable note, and it does not very clearly appear, but perhaps it is intended to appear, that the indorsement was made before the delivery. In that case the court observed: "By the common law of Connecticut, a blank indorsement of a note not negotiable prima facie implies a contract on the part of the indorser that the note is due and payable according to its tenor; that the maker shall be of ability to pay it when it comes to maturity, and that it is collectable by the use of due diligence. . . . Does our law regard such an indorsement as subject to the same legal construction, and as imposing upon the payee the same legal diligence, as if the note were not negotiable? We think it does so regard it; and that in Connecticut the indorsement in blank of a negotiable note, by a third person, for the better security of the payee, prima facie imports the same contract as the blank indorsement of a note not negotiable. Until the year 1811, promissory notes were not negotiable in this state according to the custom of merchants."

In Castle v. Candee (1844) 16 Conn. 223, where the case is not free from obscurity, it seems to be reasonably clear that the indorsement of the third party was made before delivery, it being a blank indorsement, and was of a non-negotiable note due on demand. The court said: "The fifth count in this declaration alleges the contract to be that the defendant, by his indorsement on the back of said note, undertook and faithfully promised the plaintiff that the note should be good and collectable by the use of due diligence for a reasonable time. If this note had been made payable at some future day, as in the common cases, there could be no doubt but it would, with the indorsement, have been admissible in evidence to prove that promise, under this count. But, as we have said, the law implies the same contract in the case of a note payable on demand, and therefore it follows that this note and indorsement were admissible under this count."

There are two cases in Texas which apparently hold that the import is one of suretyship, but while the notes appear to be non-negotiable, the decisions do not point out whether they were so considered by the court.

In Cook v. Southwick (1853) 9 Tex. 615, 60 Am. Dec. 181, on a note by A to B, indorsed by C, A and C were sued by the assignee of B, and it was held that, as it appeared from the note and the evidence that the consideration passed to the maker of the note, the indorser was liable as a surety. The court does not comment on the fact that the note is not to order, but simply to the person of the payee.

In Carr v. Rowland (1855) 14 Tex. 275, A made a note to B and C, which was indorsed by B and D, and E brought an action upon it alleging that C had transferred to him all his interest in said note for a valuable consideration by delivery without indorsement, and it was held that D was a surety. The note had no negotiable words in it.

IV. Liability according to intention.

It is the general rule that the intention may be shown and the liability be fixed accordingly. Saussey v. Weeks (1905) 122 Ga. 70, 49 S. E. 809; Fear v. Dunlap (1848) 1 G. Greene (Iowa) 331 (obiter); Third Nat. Bank v. Lange (1878) 51 Md. 138, 34 Am. Rep. 304; Lewis v. Harvey (1853) 18 Mo. 74, 59 Am. Dec. 286; Richards v. Warring (1864) 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 47, 1 Keyes, 576; New York Security & T. Co. v. Storm (1894) 81 Hun, 33, 30 N. Y. Supp. 605; Lang v. Fegenbush (1865)

2 Phila. (Pa.) 20, affirmed in (1857) 28 Pa. 193; Comparree v. Brockway (1850) 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 355 (obiter); Orrick v. Colston (1850) 7 Gratt. (Va.) 189; Kearnes v. Montgomery (1870) 4 W. Va. 29; Long v. Campbell (1893) 37 W. Va. 665, 17 S. E. 197; Young v. Sehon (1903) 53 W. Va. 127, 62 L.R.A. 499, 97 Am. St. Rep. 970, 44 S. E. 136 (obiter).

Compare Connecticut Cases, supra, III.

In Saussy v. Weeks (1905) 122 Ga. 70, 49 S. E. 809, the court said: "Where one who is neither maker nor payee of a non-negotiable promissory note writes his name on the back of the note, either before or after delivery to the payee, he becomes liable as indorser, guarantor, maker, or surety, according to the intention and agreement of the parties at the time he signs the paper. See 7 Cyc. 673, 674. The decisions are by no means uniform, and some draw a distinction between cases where the signature is placed on the note before and after delivery, but we think the rule above stated the correct one."

Where the payee of a non-negotiable note sued together the maker as maker, and a third party who had indorsed it "as indorser," and the indorser demurred, claiming that he was a guarantor and as such not suable in the same action with the maker in the county of the latter's residence, he residing elsewhere, the court overruled the demurrer, stating that the indorser might plead and prove his true relation if it was not that of indorser. Saussy v. Weeks (Ga.) supra, where it did not appear whether the indorsement was before or after delivery.

In Third Nat. Bank v. Lange (1878) 51 Md. 138, 34 Am. Rep. 304, where before delivery a non-negotiable promissory note was indorsed by a third party as security for the drawers of the note, and the payee of the note, who was named therein as trustee, afterward indorsed his name above the other and then sold the paper in breach of his trust, it was held that the obligation of the third party was that of an original maker, and that, having placed his name upon the note as security, he could not be held to a contract of guaranty of the right of the indorser to assign, into which he had not entered, and that he was entitled to show the facts as to the time when the indorsement was made.

In Lewis v. Harvey (1853) 18 Mo. 74, 59 Am. Dec. 286, the promissory notes in question wanted the words "negotiable and payable," which under the Missouri statute were necessary to make them negotiable with a like effect as inland bills of exchange, and they had been indorsed by the defendants before delivery to the payee. The defendants answered that they had supposed that the plaintiffs would indorse them so that the defendants would be subsequent indorsers, but this answer was stricken out, and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs. On appeal the court, in reversing the judgment, said: "In this country there has been a very great diversity of opinion in relation to the contract which the law implies from the fact that an individual writes his name on the back of a negotiable note which is already complete in having a maker and payee. But there does not appear to be the same difference in relation to notes which are not negotiable. The decisions in most of the states in which the liability of such party to a note not negotiable has been considered appear to agree that he is liable as an original promisor, and in this state the question was decided in Powell v. Thomas (1842) 7 Mo. 440, 38 Am. Dec. 465, and such was held to be the meaning and effect of his contract."

In Richards v. Warring (1864) 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 47, 1 Keyes, 576, a note was made by A and B to C having no negotiable words, and indorsed by D, and C's executor recovered upon it against D, without showing any notice of demand or of protest, and this judgment was affirmed. It was shown that the indorsement was made before delivery. The court stated that the defendant signed the note before it was negotiated, at the request and for the benefit of the makers, to enable them to raise money on it; "he signed it as the referee has found, 'with the intent to become liable to pay the same to the payee.'" The court said: "If the note had been negotiable, it is clearly settled that he could not have been held without a regular demand and protest of the note, and this upon the principle that as the paper admitted of the contract of indorsement, and the name was written in the place and in the manner in which the names of indorsers usually appear, he must be presumed to have intended to adopt that character, and no other. But in the present case the defendant is not indorser in the commercial sense, and the paper does not on its face import the contract of indorsement. We cannot therefore presume an intention to assume only the restricted liability of an indorser. The defendant must therefore be held in some other character, or must be absolutely discharged as not having contracted any effectual legal liability whatever. . . . He is, in effect, the maker of the note, an original party to the instrument, whose name, equally with that of the other makers, was intended to give currency and credit to it in the hands of the payee, and on the faith of whose signature, either as principal or as surety for the other makers, the paper was discounted. The signature on the back of the instrument is not inconsistent with his liability as a maker, if he, in fact, intended to assume that character. Perhaps also he may be held as guarantor. A contract of that description does not appear to me irreconcilable with the liability he intended to assume; and if he meant to be liable in that character, a contract of that description might be written over his name, and I think a consideration 'for value received' therein stated, inasmuch as the facts developed on the trial to show a sufficient consideration to bind him. It is enough, however, in my opinion, to declare that he is liable, on the facts proved, to pay the note, and it is not important whether he be called by one name or another." The court cited as in point Griswold v. Slocum (1851) 10 Barb. (N. Y.) 402, supra, III.

In New York Security & T. Co. v. Storm (1894) 81 Hun, 33, 30 N. Y. Supp. 605, a complaint was held sufficient which set up a non-negotiable (sealed) promissory note to the plaintiff, and which alleged that prior to the delivery of the note, the defendant Storm and ten other individuals, "for valuable consideration, and for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to make said advance and accept said note, placed their names upon and delivered to plaintiff said note so indorsed in order to secure payment thereof to the plaintiff, and for the purpose of becoming liable to the plaintiff for such payment; and said defendants thereby became liable to the plaintiff for the payment thereof; that plaintiff relied upon the obligations of the defendants and was thereby induced to, and therefore did, make said advance and accept said note;" that thereafter the note was delivered to the plaintiff, which has ever since been the legal holder and owner thereof for value.

In Lang v. Fegenbush (1856) 2 Phila. (Pa.) 20, where the payee sued the indorser of a non-negotiable note, it was held that full justice was done to the defendant by instructing the jury that his indorsement alone would not make him answerable to the plaintiff, and that his liability depended on whether his intention was to enable the maker to obtain credit from the payee, and whether the latter gave credit on the face of the indorsement, the court considering that the indorsement of the note had no definite or legal import, and depended for its effect on the circumstances under and the consideration for which it is given; hence it raised no presumption either for or against the indorser, and made the question of his liability one of mere fact to be decided upon all the evidence of the cause as in an ordinary case of guaranty. This case was affirmed in (1857) 28 Pa. 193, where it was said: "The evidence is clear and uncontradicted, tending to show that the indorsement, although made before the note was delivered to or indorsed by the payee, was made for the purpose of procuring a loan of money from him to the maker of the note, and that Lang, the indorser, was to be security for the repayment of it. Under these circumstances it was not error to instruct the jury that, 'if the note was indorsed by the defendant with the view of obtaining a loan, and a loan was made on the faith of the indorsement, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, otherwise not.' Applying these instructions to the evidence, they must have been understood by the jury as submitting to them to decide whether the defendant contracted with the plaintiff to become security to him for the money advanced to the maker; and they have responded in the affirmative."

In Orrick v. Colston (1850) 7 Gratt. (Va.) 189, A wrote B a letter inclosing what he said was a blank note at eight months, which he wished him to fill up with as much as he could spare him, and which was a paper signed in blank by A and C and indorsed in blank by D; whereupon B advanced the makers $1,000 and filled out over their signatures a promissory note payable to B, his heirs or assigns, and after the action was brought he wrote over the blank signature of the indorser these words: "In consideration of the loan of $1,000 by Cromwell Orrick, I hereby guarantee the payment of the within sum of money." The trial court gave judgment for the defendant in an action by B against the indorser, but on appeal this was reversed. The court held that the plaintiff had a right at the trial to fill out above the indorser's name any contract that was within the intention of the parties, and that if the manner in which he had filled it out was not in conformity with his counts, he had a right to change it to make it in due form, and that he had a right to charge the indorser either as a collateral promisor or as a direct and absolute surety.

In Long v. Campbell (1893) 37 W. Va. 665, 17 S. E. 197, where a non-negotiable note was made with the name of the payee left blank, and it was indorsed in this condition with the intent that money be raised upon it, and it was then delivered to the payee at the time when his name was filled in, it was held that he had a right to hold makers and indorsers as original promisors. The court in the opinion refers to the decision in Kearnes v. Montgomery (1870) 4 W. Va. 29, as disapproved in Burton v. Hansford (1877) 10 W. Va. 471, 27 Am. Rep. 571, and as against the current of authority, and not sound; but the court in the Long Case probably intends to criticize not the decision, but the reasoning of Judge Maxwell in that case.

In Burton v. Hansford (W. Va.) supra, the court said of the Montgomery Case: "In the case of Kearnes v. Montgomery (W. Va.) supra, the defendant, owing the plaintiff, proposed to him to take for his debt the bond of third parties, which the defendant had drawn payable directly to the plaintiff. The plaintiff refused to accept this bond, as it was payable to the plaintiff instead of to the defendant, unless the defendant would indorse it. The defendant wrote his name on the back of it, and the plaintiff accepted it, surrendering to the defendant his bond which plaintiff held for the debt. The bond not being paid, the plaintiff brought an action of assumpsit against the defendant, and before the trial wrote over the defendant's indorsement, 'For value received, I hereby become the security of the obligors in the within bond.' The court held that the plaintiff could not hold the defendant bound as original promisor or security, but only as guarantor. This decision is in consonance with the principles laid down above, and with the case of Orrick v. Colston (Va.) supra. The evidence showed that 'the defendant was to assume the same situation as to liability that he would have occupied had the paper been executed to him as payee and transferred by him to the plaintiff.' And such liability would not have been direct, but only collateral. The prima facie responsibility of the defendant as original promisor at the election of the payee was therefore in that case overthrown by the proof showing that he was only to be bound collaterally." And the L.R.A.1916D.

court goes on to say that the reasoning of Judge Maxwell in the Montgomery Case was inconsistent with the opinion in Orrick v. Colston (Va.) supra, and not concurred in by one of the other judges; and the court in the Burton Case continues: "If we are to infer that he thought there was a difference in such case between the liability of a stranger who indorses a note not negotiable and one who indorses a negotiable note, I think both reason and authority show that such distinction is not well founded. The review of the cases before cited satisfies my mind that no such distinction can properly be drawn. And if there is no such distinction, then, as I have endeavored to show above, the responsibility of a stranger so indorsing would not be that of a guarantor only, but, at the option of the payee, it would prima facie be either that of an original promisor or that of a guarantor. . . . In this case it is only necessary to decide that a stranger who indorses negotiable paper at the time it was made is prima facie liable to the payee as original promisor if he chooses to so regard him."

McPhee v. MCPhee (1890) 19 Ont. Rep. 603, was a case where a firm, as evidence of its indebtedness to the wife of one of the members, gave her a non-negotiable note made by one member of the firm and indorsed by the other (it seems to be taken for granted in the case that we are to suppose that the wife was the payee of the note, but this is nowhere stated). The court permitted her to amend and allege that by such indorsement the indorser had rendered himself liable to the plaintiff as a maker or as a guarantor or as a surety for the maker or on an account stated; it seems to consider that he was a guarantor and held that he was liable.

This case is referred to in Robertson v. Lonsdale (1891) 21 Ont. Rep. 600, which concerned an indorsement made long after the maturity of the note, the court saying: "The case of McPhee v. MCPhee (Ont.) supra, was cited by Mr. Middleton. But that was a case where, a partnership having borrowed money from the plaintiff for partnership purposes, one member of the firm gave to the plaintiff a non-negotiable promissory note, upon the back of which the other member of the firm signed his name. The proper legal interpretation to have put upon the transaction in that case was that the party putting his name on the back of the note, being liable on the consideration for which the note was given, might be treated as a joint maker; or it could be regarded as evidence of an account stated between the plaintiff, to whom the amount represented by the note was due, and the defendant, who had put his name on the back thereof. Gould v. Coombs (1845) 1 C. B. (Eng.) 543, 14 L. J. C. P. N. S. 175, 9 Jur. 494. Under some of the American authorities a person writing his name on the back of a non-negotiable note, without more, would be regarded as a guarantor; but I was in error in holding that under the English or Canadian authorities he could be so considered." The court apparently means that the statute of frauds would prevent such a holding.

In Young v. Sehon (1903) 53 W. Va. 127, 62 L.R.A. 499, 97 Am. St. Rep. 970, 44 S. E. 136, cited in BROWN v. COOK, ante, 220, A made a non-negotiable note payable to B, which was indorsed by B and C and then delivered to a person from whom money was borrowed for the benefit of the maker, and it was held that such person had a right to hold the indorsers as original promisors or as guarantors. The court, having quoted from some of the text-books on the subject, went on to say: "These authorities clearly show that the rule against the admission of parol evidence to show the consideration, the relation of the parties, and the circumstances attending the execution of the paper, to the end that the true intent may be ascertained and effectuated, has no application in the case of non-negotiable paper. This being true, the rule of liability pronounced by the law must be the same in this case as it is in the cases of irregular indorsements decided by this court, and to which reference has been made. In those cases it has been decided that the holder of the paper may treat the parties thereto either as makers or as guarantors, according to his own election, however their names may stand upon the paper."

In Comparree v. Brockway (1850) 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 355, a case of a negotiable note, the court observed: "It is not necessary that we should enter into any discussion of the well-settled distinction between the effect of an indorsement in blank on a negotiable note, and a note not negotiable. In respect to paper not negotiable by the law merchant, it is held that if a third person place his name on the back of a note, at the time it was made, he may be held liable as an original maker or guarantor, according to the circumstances of the case and the understanding of the parties. Story, Promissory Notes, §§ 473-475, and L.R.A. 1916D.

The reason appears to be that, as such note is not negotiable according to mercantile usage, the person so indorsing in blank cannot be regarded as an indorser, or charged as such; but having put his name on the paper to give it credit or add to its security, he will be held responsible in a different form, and treated as an original promisor or guarantor. Thus far, most of the American cases concur; but as regards negotiable mercantile paper, there is not the same concurrence of judicial opinion. There are cases which decide that the principle just stated as applicable to paper not negotiable applies equally to regular negotiable paper; such at least is the conclusion which they tend to establish. We think the law is otherwise clearly settled."

A note to the order of B, marked "non-negotiable or transferable," was signed, A, "principal," C, D, "indorser," and was indorsed by A, "This note is not transferable, nor to be used as collateral without the written consent of principal and indorsers;" and underneath this was indorsed by D, "And if so used shall be absolutely void, D, indorser." It was held that the note was not a negotiable note, but that it was transferable, and that D, having named himself at the foot of the note as an indorser, had a right to show in what character he had actually signed; he could not be a regular indorser, and could not be entitled to notice of nonpayment, as the paper was not negotiable, but "he may show that he signed in any of several characters (if there be several) which the nature of his obligation will permit. We have shown that his obligation was either that of a maker or a guarantor. Whether it was one or the other might be shown by him by evidence aliunde." Herrick v. Edwards (1904) 106 Mo. App. 633, 81 S. W. 466.

Vermont.

In Vermont the matter seems in some doubt. In the Barrows Case (Vt.) infra, we are not informed whether the court considered the note negotiable or not, nor does it appear in the Sanford Case (Vt.) infra, whether the court meant in its opinion to refer both to notes non-negotiable and negotiable.

In Barrows v. Lane (1832) 5 Vt. 161, 26 Am. Dec. 293, the plaintiff brought an action on a promissory note payable to him in good neat cattle or in grain, signed by one defendant and indorsed in blank by the other. It was admitted that the indorsement was before the delivery of the note, but there was dispute as to the contract, and it was held by the court that the defendant indorser had a right to explain the circumstances of his indorsement, he claiming that his contract was that he was not to be holden until the maker had first been prosecuted. The court does not comment on the form of the note, but one of the counsel observed that, since this court had decided that instruments of this description are to be treated as promissory notes, the fact that the note is payable in specific articles can make no difference. The decision of the court below, which was reversed, rejected the indorser's testimony and held that he was liable as a joint promisor.

In Sanford v. Norton (1842) 14 Vt. 228, in the case of a negotiable note, the court said: "Although a person other than the payee, putting his name upon the back of a promissory note in blank, may always, in this state, be prima facie holden as a joint promisor, if this is done before the delivery of the note, or, what is equivalent, is done in consummation of a contract made at the time of delivery, still this presumption may always be repelled by proof. In such case it may always be shown by parol what was the precise nature of the contract assumed by making such blank indorsement. Barrows v. Lane (Vt.) supra; Knapp v. Parker (1834) 6 Vt. 642; Flint v. Day (1837) 9 Vt. 345."

V. Sealed notes.

In general, that the instrument irregularly indorsed before delivery is under seal does not alter the case. New York Security & T. Co. v. Storm (1894) 81 Hun, 33, 30 N. Y. Supp. 605, supra, IV.; D. M. Osborne & Co. v. Hubbard (1891) 20 Or. 318, 11 L.R.A. 833, 25 Pac. 1021, supra, III.; Kearnes v. Montgomery (1870) 4 W. Va. 29, supra, IV. See also South Carolina cases referred to infra, subsequently to Tucker v. English.

Compare Maryland cases, infra.

In Tucker v. English (1844) 2 Speers, L. (S. C.) 673, the court affirmed the decision of the trial court nonsuiting the plaintiff, who attempted to charge the defendant as maker of a promissory note, where a third person made a single bond or bill under seal payable to plaintiff or order, and the defendant wrote his name upon the back of it. "The presiding judge was of opinion that this did not make the defendant the maker of a note on hand. For the paper on which he wrote his name was not a note. It was a bond without condition, and is therefore called a single bill, and if the defendant's name on the back of it had any legal effect, it could only be as the drawer of a bill of exchange, by appointing the bond to be paid to another. But he could not be considered as promising to pay the contents, according to the tenor and effect. For in law the instrument was not regarded as a promise, but as an obligation to pay."

The later South Carolina cases have taken a different view.

In Cockrell v. Milling (1847) 1 Strobb. L. (S. C.) 444, A made a sealed note to the order of B, which was indorsed by C before delivery to give the maker credit with the payee for furniture; it was held that the court properly instructed the jury that they might find the indorser liable as the drawer of the note, which they did. The court seemed to think, on the whole, that it made no difference that the document was a sealed document, and that in every other particular the case was the same as Stoney v. Beaubien (1842) 2 McMull. L. (S. C.) 313, 39 Am. Dec. 128, where the note was negotiable. The court said of the case of Tucker v. English (S. C.) supra: "In the very short report of that case, it is said, 'A third person made a single bill under seal payable to the plaintiff or order; the defendant wrote his name on the back.' If this was all the evidence, then the opinion of the presiding judge, which was affirmed in this court, that it did not make the defendant a drawer of a note of hand, was unquestionably correct. If a stranger to the contract wrote his name on the back of a single bill, without any consideration which might charge him as a guarantor, he would incur no liability. He could not be charged as drawer, for he was no party to the original contract. But the case of Tucker v. English is very different from this case. Here Milling was a party to the original contract. His name was on the note before it was delivered. It was put there as the security which the plaintiff required as a condition precedent to the delivery of the furniture. I do not think, therefore, there is anything in Tucker v. English which is inconsistent with the direction given to the jury on the circuit."

Watson v. Barr (1892) 37 S. C. 463, 16 S. E. 188, was an action on a sealed note by B to A or bearer, C and D signing across the back of the note. It was held that a complaint by the payee alleging that the three defendants, the maker and the two indorsers, delivered the note to him, which when delivered was payable to him, and that the defendants owed the debt, was not demurrable. The court said: "Of course, the only difficulty suggested is that the note being unnegotiable, being a sealed note of the principal obligor, W. F. Barr, that, as to the two Browns, not being under seal as to them, and their names being written across the back of the note, the plaintiff could not recover against them as makers. Now, the complaint alleges that the three defendants delivered the note to him; when delivered, it was payable to the plaintiff, and that the defendants owe the debt. This is not the case of the payee or obligee of a sealed note merely signing his name on the back when he transferred the note, as was the case of Tryon v. De Hay (1853) 7 Rich. L. (S. C.) 12; nor such indorser after maturity of sealed note, as was the case of Garrett v. Butler (1847) 2 Strobb. L. (S. C.) 193. But it belongs to that class of cases that hold that, where a third person writes his name anywhere on the note to evidence that he holds himself out as responsible to the payee or bearer for the payment of the note, he is, and should be, treated as a maker of the note."

In Maryland the matter is obscure or doubtful.

Gist v. Drakely (1844) 2 Gill (Md.) 330, 41 Am. Dec. 426, arose upon two sealed notes of a corporation signed by the president to the order of the president's individual name, and indorsed by him and the defendant before delivery, and the defendant had actually received value for them from the corporation in the shape of a large credit upon claims which it had against him. Before offering the same in evidence plaintiff filled out over the indorsements these words: "For value received, we jointly and severally promise Thomas Drakely to pay him the amount of the within bill obligatory, should the Eutaw Company, the obligee therein named, make default in the payment thereof, when the same shall become due." It was held that the defendant was made absolutely liable to pay the note, and that the indorsement was filled as the plaintiff was entitled to fill it, and that the intention of the parties must be looked to.

In Culbertson v. Smith (1879) 52 Md. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 384, where there was an indorsement of a single bill made long after delivery, the court, in holding that the effort to hold the indorser was against the statute of frauds, stated that in the Gist Case the indorsements were made under special arrangements before delivery.

In Seigman v. Hoffacker (1881) 57 Md. 321, a third person indorsed a single bill under seal before delivery, and the pleadings in the suit against such indorser did not contain any allegation as to his entering upon any particular undertaking by reason of such indorsement, and it may be that the omission of such an allegation, or evidence to such effect, cost the plaintiff his case. The court stated that the action could not be maintained as a suit on the single bill, for, whatever might have been the effect of the defendant's indorsement, it did not make him a drawer because his engagement was not under seal. "In such case the right of action is confined to the distinct and collateral contract which the indorsement creates." And after referring to the doctrine that the indorser of a promissory note before delivery makes himself liable as a drawer, the court continued: "In the interest of trade, and to protect bona fide holders of such promissory notes, the law makes the 'conclusive presumption' against such indorser that he intended to be held as a drawer, and so holds him. Where the instrument indorsed is a sealed bill, a different rule applies, and the party so indorsing is presumed to enter into a different kind of engagement. Gist v. Drakely (Md.) supra."

VI. Miscellaneous.

In Oyler v. McMurray (1893) 7 Ind. App. 645, 34 N. E. 1004, where a third party indorsed the note, it was held that while the last clause of the note made it non-negotiable, more than one extension without notice to the indorser would discharge him. The last clause of the note read: "The drawers and indorsers severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest, and non-payment of this note, and all defenses on the ground of any extension of the time of its payment that may be given by the holder or holders to them or either of them."

In Quesenberry v. Woods (1908) 64 W. Va. 5, 60 S. E. 881, where it is not stated whether the note was negotiable or not, it was held that an allegation that A made his note to the order of B, and at the time of its delivery to B it was indorsed by C and D, was not sufficient to charge the indorsers as makers, but the fact that the maker and the irregular indorsers were sued jointly in an action of debt was enough to show that the plaintiff had elected to hold such indorsers as promisors.

In Robertson v. Davis (1897) 27 Can.

S. C. 571, A made a promissory note to B and C, which had across its face the words, "Not negotiable and given as security," and which was indorsed by D, and the payee sued the maker and indorser jointly and severally for the full amount. It was proved that the indorsement was made to give the maker of the note credit with the payee, who was to make sales of certain property and credit the amount to the maker, and no statement of their transactions, of which there had been several, had been made to the indorser, and it was held that the cause of action proved was different from that declared on, and that the plaintiff could not recover.

In Nelson v. Dubois (1816) 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 175, the plaintiff sued the defendant on a note made by a third party to the plaintiff or bearer and indorsed by the defendant, and offered to show that the indorsement was made before delivery upon an agreement on the part of the defendant that he would become security for the maker of the note, and it was held that it was error to refuse to admit this testimony, that the case was not within the statute of frauds, and that the plaintiff had a right to fill in above the indorsement the actual agreement that had been made. It was claimed by the plaintiff's counsel that it made no difference whether the note was negotiable or not. The headnote puts the case of a promissory note payable to bearer, or not negotiable, but the opinion does not seem to rest the case particularly on any non-negotiability of the note. B. B. B.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

NATIONAL UNION FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 55.

(— Ark. —, 182 S. W. 547.)

Insurance — failure to forward application — liability.

An insurance company is not liable for the negligence of its agent in failing to forward an application accompanied by payment of premium, so that the property is destroyed without insurance, where he had authority only to solicit applications, deliver policies, and receipt for initial premiums, and the application stipulated that there should be no contract until the issuance and delivery of the policy.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clay County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover for loss sustained by fire, upon an alleged contract for a fire insurance policy. Reversed.

Note.—The court in NATIONAL UNION F. Ins. Co. v. SCHOOL DIST. denied the plaintiff's right to recover either upon the theory that a contract of insurance had been consummated, or upon the theory of an action of tort for negligent delay in acting on the application. The question of effect of delay in passing upon an application is covered in the annotation to Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Neafus, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1211, and Dorman v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 873, which deal specifically with the question whether the mere delay in passing upon an application can be construed as an acceptance, and bring a contract of insurance into existence.

Statement by Wood, J.:

On the 17th of February, 1913, R. H. McDermott, acting for the directors of school district No. 55 of Clay County, made a written application to the National Union Fire Insurance Company for a policy of insurance, covering the school building and its contents. The application, together with $20 in payment of the premium, was delivered to T. A. Wynne, soliciting agent of the company. The policy of insurance applied for was never delivered, and on the 6th of January, 1914, the building and contents were totally destroyed by fire. This suit was instituted on the 8th of October by the appellee against appellant to recover damages on account of the loss. The undisputed facts are as follows:

T. A. Wynne was a soliciting agent of the appellant, having authority to take applications, receive premiums, and to forward applications for policies to the company or its general agent for acceptance or rejection. On February 17, 1913, appellee made application to Wynne for a policy of insurance on its school building and contents, to take effect April 2, 1913. Wynne received the first premium, but did not transmit the application to the insurance company, and the policy was never issued.

For the cases dealing with the liability of an insurer on the ground of tort for negligent delay in passing upon or issuing a policy until after loss, see annotation to Boyer v. State Farmers' Mut. Hail Ins. Co. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 164, and the later case of Duffy v. Bankers' Life Asso. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 25.

The insurance company was, at the time, writing insurance on property of the character mentioned, and Wynne had taken applications and the company had accepted same and issued policies on risks of the same character. The application which the appellee signed contains information concerning the ownership, the value of the property, its occupancy, and such matters. It contained also this stipulation: "It is understood and agreed that this application shall not be construed as a contract of insurance against said company until the same shall be approved by the officers of said company, which approval shall be evidenced by the issue and delivery of its policy."

The court, in effect, told the jury in its instructions, over appellant's objection, that if Wynne was the agent of the appellant, and had authority as such to receive applications for insurance, and to forward same to the company, and receive the payment of premiums thereon, that if he neglected for an unreasonable length of time to forward the application to the company, and if the company would have issued its policy if the application had been forwarded, and if they found that, by reason of such neglect on the part of the appellant's agent, the appellee suffered the loss complained of, they should find in its favor.

The appellant asked the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor, which the court refused, to which ruling of the court the appellant duly excepted. The appellant also asked the court, in effect, to tell the jury that the taking of the application for the insurance and the receipt of the insurance premium would not constitute a contract of insurance between the school district and the company, that Wynne, being a mere soliciting agent, had no power to bind the company to the issuance of an insurance policy, and that it was the duty of the appellee to ascertain the scope of his authority before paying the premium; and if it failed to do so, the loss was at its peril.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the appellee for the amount claimed, to wit, $500. A judgment was entered against the appellant in favor of the appellee, and this appeal has been duly prosecuted.

Messrs. Spence & Dudley, for appellant:

Even though the premium paid may still be in the hands of the soliciting agent at the time the loss against which the insurance proposed to protect occurred, the insurer is not liable unless he has actually accepted the application.

Mere delay in passing upon an application for insurance cannot be construed into acceptance thereof by the insurer.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court correctly instructed the jury that "there was no contract of insurance in this case." The only issue presented by this appeal is whether or not an insurance company is liable for the negligence of its agent in failing to send to the company an application for insurance, where the only authority of the agent is to solicit applications for insurance, to deliver policies when issued, and to receive and receipt for initial premiums.

When an agent acts within the scope of his authority, the principal is bound. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Ryan, 56 Ark. 247, 19 S. W. 839. Now in the written application of appellee for a policy of insurance it is stated: "It is understood and agreed that this application shall not be construed as a contract of insurance against said company until same shall be approved by the officers of said company, which approval shall be evidenced by the issuance and delivery of its policy."

Under the express terms of this proposal on the part of appellee for insurance it is stipulated that there shall be no contract of insurance until the company shall approve the application, and evidence its approval by the issuance of a policy. Under this stipulation of appellee, even if the soliciting agent had promptly forwarded the application to the company, the latter was under no legal obligation to issue the policy to appellee. The authority of the soliciting agent to receive and forward the application, if strictly followed, did not impose upon the appellant any legal duty.

If the application had been promptly transmitted and received, appellant would not have been liable until the policy was actually issued. Cooksey v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 73 Ark. 117, 108 Am. St. Rep. 26, 83 S. W. 317; People's Mut. L. Acci. & Health Ins. Co. v. Powell, 98 Ark. 166, 135 S. W. 823. Negligence and liability therefor cannot be predicated upon a state of facts that do not impose any legal duty.

The better reason and the decided weight of authority supports the doctrine that mere delay is passing upon an application for insurance cannot be construed as accepting such application and consenting to be bound for the insurance sought by it, nor can a cause of action for negligence be grounded upon such delay. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Mayes, 61 Ala. 163, and other cases cited in appellant's brief.

The soliciting agent, with only the limited authority shown by the undisputed evidence, could not bind the company by stating that a policy would be issued. American Ins. Co. v. Hornbarger, 85 Ark. 337, 108 S. W. 213. Appellee could not assume or presume that the special agent, with only limited authority, could bind his principal by any statements he made concerning his own authority. Appellee must be held, under the undisputed evidence, to have known the extent and nature of the authority of appellant's special agent. United States Bedding Co. v. Andre, 105 Ark. 111, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1019, 150 S. W. 413, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 800.

It follows that appellee, under the undisputed evidence, had no cause of action, and the trial court erred in not so declaring.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is dismissed.

AGNES R. SPELLMAN, Impleaded, etc.,
Appt.,
v.

H. L. BEEMAN.

(— Fla. —, 70 So. 589.)

Mortgage — failure to record — right of junior mortgagee.

1. Under § 2496 of the General Statutes of 1906, a subsequent mortgagee of personal property occupies the same position with reference to a prior unrecorded mortgage upon the chattel as a subsequent purchaser. For other cases, see Chattel Mortgage, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — possession by mortgagee.

2. Section 2496, Gen. Stat. 1906, makes possession by the mortgagee of mortgaged personal property essential to the validity of the mortgage as to creditors and subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration and without notice unless it be recorded.

For other cases, see Chattel Mortgage, II. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — priority of record.

3. A chattel mortgage once void as to a subsequent mortgagee for a valuable consideration and without notice of the prior unrecorded mortgage is not restored to validity, as against the second mortgage, in the absence of fraud on the second mortgagee's part, by filing it for record before the second mortgage is filed for record.

APPEAL by defendant Spellman from a decree of the Circuit Court for Orange County in complainant's favor in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dickinson & Dickinson, for appellant:

It is the duty of the person seeking to bring himself within the recording acts to see that his paper is recorded in the right place.

Grand Rapids Nat. Bank v. Ford, 143 Mich. 402, 114 Am. St. Rep. 668, 107 N. W. 76, 8 Ann. Cas. 102; Parsons v. Lent, 34 N. J. Eq. 67; Thompson v. Mack, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 150; Snow v. Lake, 20 Fla. 656, 51 Am. Rep. 625.

If plaintiff's mortgage was never recorded, the recording could not relate back to the time of filing.

Sawyer v. Adams, 8 Vt. 172, 30 Am. Dec. 459.

In order for plaintiff, whose mortgage was subsequent to the mortgage of defendant, to have a priority over her, his mortgage should have been recorded according to law.

1 Jones, Mortg. § 607.

The return of plaintiff's mortgage to him after being transcribed in Miscellaneous Book was equivalent to withdrawing the mortgage from the files.

A recording in the wrong book is not constructive notice, and does not entitle the holder of a second mortgage to priority, and it is the duty of the holder of a mortgage to see that it is recorded in the proper book.

Messrs. Davis & Giles, for appellee:

Immediately upon the delivery of the Beeman mortgage to the clerk, with instructions to record the same in accordance with the statute, the same was deemed recorded, and notice was immediately given all those concerned of the existence of the mortgage, and failure of the clerk to properly perform his duty can in no wise affect the notice that was given upon the filing of the instrument for record.

Ellis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of foreclosure of a chattel mortgage. W. M. Brittain, on July 7, 1913, was indebted to H. L. Beeman in the sum of $616.53, and, being so indebted, executed and delivered to Beeman his three promissory notes for amounts aggregating that sum. In order to secure the payment of the notes Brittain executed and delivered to Beeman, on July 26, 1913, a mortgage on a certain automobile. The mortgage was filed for record in the office of the clerk of the circuit court for Orange county on September 26, 1913, and the mortgage was recorded in Miscellaneous Book 23, page 236, of the public records of Orange county. The record of the mortgage was indexed in the index of mortgages kept by the clerk in his office for that purpose, "being the same book in which all mortgages filed in his office for record are indexed." After recording the mortgage the clerk returned it to Beeman, who kept it in his possession until he turned it over to his attorney for foreclosure. It was never recorded in any other book in the office of the clerk of the circuit court for Orange county.

On the 14th day of May, 1913, Brittain was indebted to Agnes R. Spellman in the sum of $800, evidenced by his promissory note to her of that date. To secure the payment of that note he executed and delivered to Agnes R. Spellman a mortgage on the same automobile above mentioned. The mortgage was filed for record in the office of the clerk of the circuit court for Orange county on the 5th day of June, 1914, and was recorded in Miscellaneous Book 23, page 637, of the public records of Orange county. After it was recorded it was returned to Agnes R. Spellman by the clerk, and she again filed it for record on the 21st day of September, 1914, and it was by the clerk recorded in Mortgage Book No. 27, page 554, of the public records of Orange county. When the mortgage was first filed and recorded, it was "duly indexed in the index of mortgages," and when filed the second time and recorded in the mortgage book, it was "indexed in the index of mortgages of Orange county." "Neither H. L. Beeman nor Agnes R. Spellman knew of the other's mortgage at the time of making and executing the respective mortgages, nor had any knowledge thereof, or any knowledge that the other had such mortgage." Nor was the automobile delivered to either Agnes R. Spellman or H. L. Beeman, or any one for them, nor had either of them had possession of it under their respective mortgages.

The foregoing facts were by stipulation between the solicitors for Agnes R. Spellman and H. L. Beeman agreed upon and submitted to the court upon the final hearing.

On the 8th day of October, 1914, H. L. Beeman filed his bill in chancery to foreclose his mortgage against W. M. Brittain, making Agnes R. Spellman party defendant. Copies of the notes and the original mortgage were attached to the bill as exhibits.

Agnes R. Spellman answered the bill, admitting the execution of the mortgage from Brittain to Beeman and its record on the 26th day of September, 1913, in Miscellaneous Book 23, page 236, and setting up her mortgage from Brittain, dated the 15th day of May, 1913, to secure a debt which he owed to her of $800, as evidenced by his promissory note to her for that amount, and the record of the mortgage as above recited. The answer denied that the complainant's mortgage from Brittain had ever been properly recorded. That after being recorded in Miscellaneous Book as stated, it was returned to Beeman and never refiled or "recorded in any proper book, namely, Book of Mortgages," and denied that her mortgage was a secondary lien to that of the complainant.

Brittain filed no plea, answer, or demurrer, and an order taking the bill as confessed was duly entered against him. The complainant filed a replication to the answer of Agnes R. Spellman, and the cause was heard upon the bill of complaint, answer of Agnes R. Spellman, replication, and the stipulation as to the facts above mentioned.

The chancellor rendered his decree against the defendants, ordering them to pay to the complainant the sum of $695.86 with legal interest from the date of the decree, together with $75 solicitors' fees and costs within three days, and, in default thereof, that the automobile be sold at public sale to the highest bidder for cash after notice, appointing a master to conduct the sale, and directing him to pay the complainant from the proceeds of the sale the amount decreed to be due, with solicitors' fees and costs, and to bring the surplus money, if any, into court to abide its further order, and that the defendants be barred and foreclosed from all equity of redemption in and to the mortgaged property. From this decree Agnes R. Spellman appealed to this court, and assigned eight errors.

The first and second assignments of error present the question of the superiority of the Beeman mortgage lien over that held by Agnes R. Spellman.

W. M. Brittain's debt to Agnes R. Spellman antedated his debt to H. L. Beeman by nearly two months. Brittain's mortgage to Agnes R. Spellman was executed two months and eleven days prior to the execution of his mortgage to Beeman. Beeman filed his mortgage for record eight months before Agnes R. Spellman filed hers for record. In the meantime neither had actual knowledge of the other's mortgage upon the automobile. Both mortgages were recorded in Miscellaneous Book 23 of the public records of Orange County; Beeman's mortgage being recorded on page 236, and Agnes R. Spellman's on page 637. They were both indexed in the index of mortgages kept in the clerk's office for that purpose, and being the same book in which all mortgages that were filed in that office for record were indexed.

Beeman's mortgage was returned to him after being recorded in the Miscellaneous Book, and he never had it refiled for another record. Agnes R. Spellman, however, had her mortgage refiled on September 21, 1914, and recorded in Mortgage Book No. 27, on page 554, and it was again indexed.

Section 2496, General Statutes of 1906, provides that "no chattel mortgage shall be valid or effectual against creditors or subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration and without notice unless it be recorded, or unless the property included in it be delivered to the mortgagee and continue to remain truly and bona fide in his possession."

Section 2488, General Statutes of 1906, provides that "all instruments relating to real and personal property which are authorized or required to be recorded shall be deemed to be recorded from the time the same are filed with the officer whose duty it is to record the same."

The statute relating to the duties of the clerk of the circuit court as recorder of deeds provides, among other things, that "he shall be, in the county in which he is clerk, the recorder of deeds, and of all other papers not pertaining to the circuit court which he may be required by law to record. For the purpose of such recording, he shall keep: . . . A record of mortgages, in which he shall record all mortgages on real or personal property and powers of attorney embracing a power to execute mortgages which may be in form entitled to record. . . . Indexes, alphabetical, direct and inverse, to all the foregoing books." Gen. Stat. 1906, § 1832.

Prior to the adoption of the Revised Statutes in 1892, there was no statute of this state requiring the clerk to record chattel mortgages in any specifically designated book in order to give constructive notice of their existence. So that the record of a chattel mortgage in Miscellaneous Record Book was a valid record of it, and gave constructive notice of its existence, assuming that its execution had been properly acknowledged to entitle it to record. See Ivey v. Dawley, 50 Fla. 537, 39 So. 498, 7 Ann. Cas. 354. In that case, however, § 2488 of the General Statutes, which was § 1977 of the Revised Statutes, was not construed and its effect was not considered.

This mortgage from Brittain to Beeman, which was attached to the bill of complaint as Exhibit D, and made a part of the bill, bore the following indorsement, omitting the names of the parties, character and date of the instrument: "Filed for record this 26th day of Sept. 1913, and recorded in Misc. Book 23, page 236, of the Public Records of Orange County, Florida, Record verified. B. M. Robinson, Clerk, by C. A. Vivian, D. C."

It is clear that at the time Beeman obtained his mortgage from Brittain, the mortgage held by Agnes R. Spellman from Brittain was not valid or effectual against Beeman, because the Spellman mortgage had not been recorded nor filed for record. Gen. Stat. 1906, §§ 2496, 2488. A subsequent mortgagee is on the same footing as a subsequent purchaser under § 2496 of the General Statutes. See Manny v. Woods, 33 Iowa, 265; Plaisted v. Holmes, 58 N. H. 619; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1014; Van Winkle v. Crowell, 146 U. S. 42, 36 L. ed. 880, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18; Sheets v. Poff, 123 Iowa, 714, 99 N. W. 573; Jones, Chat. Mortg. 5th ed. § 493.

mortgage, and is not a conveyance to the legal title or right of possession, yet § 2496 of the General Statutes makes possession by the mortgagee of the mortgaged property essential to the validity of the mortgage as against creditors and subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration and without notice unless it be recorded.

The record of the mortgage, therefore, is a substitute for the possession of the property by the mortgagee. 6 Cyc. 1097; 5 R. C. L. "Chattel Mortgages," § 35; Cardenas v. Miller, 108 Cal. 250, 49 Am. St. Rep. 84, 39 Pac. 783, 41 Pac. 472; Second Nat. Bank v. Gilbert, 174 Ill. 485, 66 Am. St. Rep. 306, 51 N. E. 584; Moors v. Reading, 167 Mass. 322, 57 Am. St. Rep. 460, 45 N. E. 760; Jones, Chat. Mortg. 5th ed. §§ 176-178; Cook v. Mann. 6 Colo. 21.

Under the common law, possession of property by the mortgagee under a chattel mortgage was necessary to its validity. The mortgagee acquired title to the property, subject to a defeasance. While, under our statute, it is a mere lien, yet the recording laws require possession by the mortgagee, or record of the instrument, as essential to good faith and protection of creditors and subsequent purchasers against fraud. In some states failure to take possession of the property by the mortgagee, or failure to record the instrument, is made evidence of fraud as to creditors or subsequent purchasers, subject to rebuttal by evidence of good faith; but in this state our statute renders such failure by the mortgagee to take possession of the property or to record the instrument conclusive of its invalidity as to creditors and subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration and without notice. If it were not so, the statute requiring the record of the mortgage or possession of the property by the mortgagee could be utilized to bring about successfully the fraud which it was designed to prevent,—the setting up of secret mortgages against persons dealing with the mortgagor on the faith that his property was not encumbered. "This statute was designed to require publicity to be given to chattel mortgages for the protection of persons mentioned therein."

The Spellman mortgage, being void as to Beeman, continued to be void as to him, and the subsequent taking of possession by Agnes R. Spellman of the mortgaged property, or the record of her mortgage after Beeman had, for a valuable consideration and without notice of her mortgage, acquired his, would not restore the validity of her mortgage as against him. See Karst v. Gane, 136 N. Y. 316, 32 N. E. 1073; Stephens v. Perrine, 143 N. Y. 476, 39 N. E. 11; Keet & R. Dry Goods Co. v. Brown, 73 Mo. App. 245; Williams v. Kirk, 68 Mo. App. 457; Landis v. McDonald, 88 Mo. App. 335; Sidener v. Bible, 43 Ind. 230; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 28 N. J. Eq. 277; Brown v. Harris, 67 N. J. L. 207, 50 Atl. 689; Cutler v. Steele, 85 Mich. 627, 48 N. W. 631.

In the case of Karst v. Gane, 136 N. Y. 324, 32 N. E. 1073, Chief Justice Andrews, in speaking for the court upon the construction of a statute similar to ours, said: "The filing stands as a substitute for immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession of the property, and avoids the conclusive presumption of fraud which would otherwise attach to the instrument under the act of 1833 in the absence of delivery and a change of possession of the mortgaged property. Some time will necessarily elapse between the execution and filing of the mortgage. Where it appears that due diligence was exercised in filing the mortgage, and there was no unnecessary delay and no actual intervening lien has been acquired, there would seem to be no ground upon which subsequent lien holders could question the validity of the mortgage under the statute of 1833. The filing under these circumstances would be immediate, and make the mortgage valid as against liens subsequently acquired. But a delay of six weeks in filing the mortgage is not a compliance with the act. There were no circumstances rendering so long a delay necessary. There can be no doubt that if, during the delay in filing, a lien had been acquired by a creditor, the mortgage as to such lien, would be void. The mortgage was, however, filed before the plaintiff's judgments and executions were obtained. This did not restore the validity of the mortgage as against creditors whose debts were in existence during the default in filing the mortgage, although judgments or executions were not obtained until after the mortgage was in fact filed."

It is unnecessary to consider the effect of the record of Beeman's mortgage in the Miscellaneous Record Book, nor the subsequent record of the Spellman mortgage in the mortgage record, because in the view we have of the case the failure of Beeman to record his mortgage did not restore to validity the mortgage of Agnes R. Spellman, who, by her conduct in failing to record her mortgage, misled and deceived Beeman and induced credit to be extended to Britain. The purpose and policy of the act was to protect one thus misled to his injury just as if the first mortgagee and his mortgagor had contrived by a system of fraudulently concealing the security or lien to induce others to extend to the mortgagor credit upon the faith of his apparently unencumbered property.

It is not necessary under the statute that there be a fraudulent intent or purpose in keeping the mortgage off the record. The statute does not require such a condition. The statute conclusively presumes that the effect of keeping the mortgage off the record, and the failure of the mortgagee to take possession of the property, is to deceive and mislead the creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice and for a valuable consideration, and declares such mortgage to be invalid as against such creditors and subsequent purchasers.

In the view we have of the case, it is unnecessary to discuss the remaining assignments of error.

The decree of the chancellor is affirmed

Taylor, Ch. J., and Shackleford, Cockrell and Whitfield, JJ., concur.

Annotation—Effect of filing chattel mortgage after giving of subsequent mortgage, but before filing of the same.

As to effect of chattel mortgagee taking possession before any specific right or lien of creditors has attached, to cure original defect in mortgage, including failure to record, as against creditors, see note to Martin v. Holloway, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 110. And generally as to retroactive effect of filing chattel mortgages for record as against lien acquired on the same property after the execution of the mortgage, see the note to Baker v. Smelser, 33 L.R.A. 163.

The rule laid down in SPELLMAN v. BEEMAN, ante, 240, namely, that a chattel mortgage once void as to a subsequent mortgagee because of failure to record L.R.A.1916D.

same prior to the giving of the second mortgage is not restored to validity as against such second mortgage by filing it for record before the second mortgage is recorded, is fully supported by the few additional cases which have passed upon that question.

Thus, in Dickson v. Tyree (1914) 92 Kan. 137, 139 Pac. 1026, where the statute provided that chattel mortgages unaccompanied by continued possession were absolutely void as against subsequent mortgagees in good faith, unless recorded, it was held that the fact that the holder of a chattel mortgage had same recorded after the giving of a subsequent mortgage, but before same was recorded, did not validate the prior mortgage so as to give it priority. This decision was upon the theory that since the first mortgage had not been recorded and the mortgagee had not taken possession at the time the second mortgage was given, the former was, by the terms of the statute, rendered absolutely void, the second mortgagee having no knowledge of the existence of the prior mortgage, and the fact that the prior mortgage was recorded after the giving of the subsequent mortgage, but prior to the recording thereof, even though in ignorance of the existence of the second mortgage, was of no avail, as the mortgagee did so not as a creditor, and not as a purchaser or mortgagee who had become such subsequent to the date of the second mortgage, but merely as the holder of an unrecorded mortgage which, on such date, became of no legal effect as against the mortgage then given.

And under a similar statute a like conclusion was reached in McCarthy v. North Texas Loan Co. (1907) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 101 S. W. 835, the court saying that as the first mortgage had not been filed in accordance with the requirements of the statute at the time of the execution of the subsequent mortgage, the mortgagees therein became subsequent mortgagees in good faith, within the meaning of the statute; and that the fact that the prior mortgagee had placed his mortgage upon record before the second mortgagees filed their mortgage did not alter the case. And the same is true of Tips v. Gay (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 306, it being again said that it was immaterial that the prior mortgage was recorded prior to the recording of the second mortgage, as the rights of the mortgagees under the latter mortgage were fixed at the time the same was executed.

And a similar line of reasoning was employed in De Courcey v. Collins (1869) 21 N. J. Eq. 357, wherein it was held that a chattel mortgage filed after the giving of a subsequent mortgage, but before a valid filing thereof, was void as against same, under a statute providing that unrecorded mortgages shall be absolutely void as against subsequent mortgagees in good faith. In this case the first mortgagees contended that the priority of record should determine the priority of lien, but the court refuted this, saying: "But the infirmity of the case of the appellants [first mortgagees] is that they are not creditors obtaining a subsequent lien. They are prior mortgagees L.R.A.1916D.

who have failed to put their mortgage on record until the lien of the second mortgage attached. These rights, consequently, are specifically regulated by the statute. The clear direction of the act is that a prior mortgage, unregistered, shall be 'absolutely void as against' subsequent mortgagees in good faith. We are asked to say that this result shall not follow unless such subsequent mortgagee shall obtain a priority in the registration of his mortgage. But we cannot say this, because the statute says just the reverse. The statute prescribes but a single condition to give a second mortgage priority over the first unregistered mortgage; viz., bona fides in the party taking it; it is not, therefore, in the competence of the court to require the performance of a second condition, viz., that such second instrument must be put first upon the record. I altogether agree in the conclusion of the chancellor that, by the true construction of the act in question, the first mortgage was entirely void as against the second one, and that consequently the omission to record the latter according to law cannot affect the result of this controversy."

And in Bank of Farmington v. Ellis (1883) 30 Minn. 270, 15 N. W. 243, where the statute declared chattel mortgages void as against subsequent bona fide mortgages unless executed in good faith and filed as provided, it was held that a chattel mortgage first executed and first filed, but not filed until after the execution of a second mortgage, was postponed to the second mortgage, it being declared that in such case it is the same as if neither mortgage had been filed.

So, in Williams v. White (1910) 165 Ala. 336, 51 So. 559, it was expressly held, under a statutory provision that conveyances of personalty to secure debts are inoperative as against creditors and purchasers without notice until recorded, that a chattel mortgage taken after a prior mortgage, but before registration thereof, was entitled to priority over such prior mortgage, although recorded subsequent to the recording of the first mortgage, the court saying that notice dates from the filing for record, and that the subsequent recording of the mortgage first given had no effect upon the title previously acquired by the subsequent mortgage, although the latter was filed subsequently to the filing of the prior mortgage.

And a similar opinion is intimated in Patrick v. Paulson (1892) 34 Neb. 416, 51 N. W. 1029, in which a subsequent mortgage was denied priority upon the ground that the mortgagees therein were not bona fide mortgagees, as required by statute.

But where, in addition to filing a first mortgage, possession has been delivered previous to the filing of a second mortgage executed prior to the filing of the first mortgage, it has been held that the first mortgage is entitled to priority. This conclusion was reached in Garrison v. Street & H. Furniture & C. Co. (1908) 21 Okla. 643, 129 Am. St. Rep. 799, 97 Pac. 978, the court expressly distinguishing the cases of Bank of Farmington v. Ellis (Minn.) and De Courcey v. Collins (N. J.) supra, upon the ground that the element of delivery of possession was not involved in those cases. In the Garrison Case the first mortgage, which was held entitled to priority, was executed on November 29, 1904, and filed on December 31, 1904, and the subsequent mortgage was given on December 15, 1904, and filed on January 3, 1905, about four hours after possession had been delivered to the first mortgagee.

And where the statutes merely provide that a chattel mortgage shall only take effect from the date of registration, it has been held that a mortgage first given and first filed is entitled to priority over a subsequent mortgage given previous to the filing of the first mortgage, but filed subsequent to the filing of such mortgage. Copeland v. Bennet (1837) 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 355. G. J. C.

Jitney bus — license fee — prohibition.

1. The provision of the ordinance in question, requiring those operating any self-propelled vehicles carrying passengers for hire to pay additional licenses of $300 to $400 before being permitted to solicit or receive passengers on the paved portions of certain designated streets, although practically prohibitive as to such designated places, is a valid exercise of municipal control.

West, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance enacted by the city of Wichita, prescribing certain regulations and requiring certain licenses from persons operating jitneys and other motor vehicles. The ordinance is attacked as void because prohibitive and unreasonable.

Without going into unnecessary detail it is sufficient to say that numerous regulations are laid down for the control of the vehicles in question, and a license of $25 to $35 is required, according to their capacity. Section 4, however, requires that before the owners of such vehicles shall be permitted to solicit or receive passengers on or along the paved portions of certain designated streets, they shall pay an additional license of $300 to $400, according to the capacity of the vehicle. It is asserted, and we are convinced, that as to these specifically designated places the requirement is, and doubtless was intended to be, practically prohibitive. We find no other feature of the ordinance about which serious question could arise as to reasonableness, and it is convincingly apparent that, regardless of this requirement of $4, the ordinance would have been enacted and would be valid. So the validity of this one provision is the sole question for determination.

It is not only suggested, and to some extent proved, as shown by the record, but it is well known, that the street car system in the city of Wichita is one long established; that the company is required to pay taxes, to keep up and maintain its tracks, and to submit to such reasonable regulations as may be prescribed for its operation. Its maintenance and continuance involve not only the investment and profit or loss upon a large sum of money, but to a great extent the convenience and necessity of the city and its inhabitants. Jitneys and similar vehicles run, not upon tracks laid at their owners' expense, but upon the public streets, with no burden of providing depots or waiting stations, or outlay, except the mere cost of vehicles and their operation. No doubt persons thus operating these conveyances for hire must be classed as and are common carriers. Being such, they are, of legal necessity, subject to regulation and control as are other common carriers of passengers for hire.

The presumption of good intention must be accorded the city in passing the ordinance. The same rules of construction apply as to a statute, and, unless clearly void, the enactment must be upheld. Swift v. Topeka, 48 Kan. 671, 8 L.R.A. 772, 23 Pac. 1075; Denning v. Yount, 9 Kan. App. 708, 59 Pac. 1092.

That the effect of § 4 is incidentally or necessarily to benefit the street railway company is not the last word to be said. It is of interest quite vital to the municipality that a street car system not only exist there, but that it be able to subsist and furnish proper and needed service. It is not a misuse of power so to legislate that this result can be accomplished merely because it involves an advantage to the utility in question as well as to the municipality.

There is no attempt to exclude from all the streets. On the contrary, all streets and parts thereof except those thus specially reserved are expressly permitted to be traversed at will.

The Constitution vests in the legislature authority to make provision by general law for the organization of cities, towns, and villages. Article 12, § 5. This has been held to add nothing to the general grant of legislative power expressed in § 1 of article 2. Wulf v. Kansas City, 77 Kan. 358, 94 Pac. 207. The legislature may rightfully prescribe the powers of a city, "subject only to constitutional restrictions." Roby v. Shunganunga Drainage Dist. 77 Kan. 754, 759, 95 Pac. 399. It can act directly or through some other body. State ex rel. Dawson v. Parsons Street R. & Electrical Co. 81 Kan. 430, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1082, 105 Pac. 704; State ex rel. Foote v. Hutchinson, 93 Kan. 405, 410, 144 Pac. 241. In pursuance of this power the legislature has conferred on cities authority to do a variety of things. "To . . . do all other acts in relation to the . . . concerns of the city necessary to the exercise of its corporate or administrative powers." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1214, subdiv. 4.

To adopt all necessary measures for the protection of the traveling public. Section 1254. To fix the rate of carriage of persons. Section 1255. To vacate and close any street or alley or portion thereof. Section 1286. To require the construction of viaducts or tunnels over and under streets or tracks. Section 1289. To levy and collect a license tax upon and regulate all occupations conducted in the city, "including . . . hackney or livery carriages . . . and all wagons and other vehicles transporting . . . passengers for pay." Section 998; see also § 1334. To issue bonds for the purpose of purchasing, constructing, or extending utilities, including a street railway. Laws 1913, chap. 123; Senate J. R. No. 15, Laws 1913, p. 199. To construct viaducts and assess the cost to a street railway company. Laws 1913, chap. 106. To acquire title by purchase, gift, or condemnation of lands for public feed lots, and to have supervision and control thereover. Laws 1915, chap. 127.

In Kansas City v. Overton, 68 Kan. 560, 75 Pac. 549, an ordinance was upheld requiring hucksters or hawkers to pay a license of $35 a month and a helper or assistant to pay a license of $15, and exempting from its operation those who personally sold the produce of their own or leased lands. In Schaake v. Dolley, 85 Kan. 598, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877, 118 Pac. 80, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 254, upholding the validity of the statute authorizing the charter board to refuse a bank charter where it deems that no public necessity therefor exists, it was pointed out that the alleged common-law right to engage in the banking business must be governed by the wants and conditions of the people, and that it is one of the functions of the legislature to provide such new rules subversive of the common law as it may deem proper for the welfare of society in the changing conditions incident to progress. It was said that to decide the act in question void would be merely to substitute the court's opinion for that of the deliberate judgment of the legislature; further, that the act does not prohibit persons from engaging in the banking business, but from needlessly duplicating an established business, regardless of the public necessity. The same doctrine applies here. Modern requirements for municipal transportation render it essential that the power to regulate by the governing body be broad. In Baxter Teleph. Co. v. Cherokee County Mut. Teleph. Asso. 94 Kan. 159, 165, L.R.A.1916D.

L.R.A.1916B, 1083, 146 Pac. 324, involving the establishment of a competitive telephone service in a field already occupied, it was suggested in the opinion (p. 165) that a mere rival can have no such interest as will permit it to maintain an action to prevent competition; that such matters are to be controlled by those acting for the public, in that case the Utilities Commission, the statute having provided as a matter of public policy that a telephone company, unless a mutual one, will not be authorized to do business until it has obtained a certificate or a license of authority "as a public convenience and necessity within the community where it seeks to do business." (p. 166.) More closely analogous, perhaps, is O'Neal v. Harrison, 96 Kan. 339, L.R.A. 1915F, 1069, 150 Pac. 551, to the effect that under a statute giving power to make regulations to secure the general health, to prevent and remove nuisances, and to compel and regulate the removal of garbage beyond the corporate limits, a city may grant an exclusive right to the highest bidder to remove all the garbage. It was vigorously contended that citizens have a natural or inherent right to remove the garbage from their own premises if they so desire, and that discrimination and favoritism were not in contemplation when the power referred to was vested in the municipality. But the court declared that "the decided weight of authority supports the right of a municipality either itself to take over the conduct of a business the manner of operating which may affect the public welfare, or to put it entirely in the hands of a single individual or company." Page 340.

It was also said (p. 342) that while monopolies are against public policy, this is a rule of the common law not binding upon the legislature.

Underlying all this authority is the substratum of reasonableness, for arbitrary, unreasonable, or capricious enactments are not a use, but an abuse, of legislative power. Nevertheless, those who pass ordinances for a city, like those who enact statutes for a state, are primarily the judges of what reasonable requirements are, and it is not for the courts to interfere unless and until it appears beyond question that the thing done was not a use, but a misuse, of power. "Before, however, the courts will interfere and declare a license tax to be unjust or unreasonable, a flagrant case of excessive and oppressive abuse of power by the city authorities in the levying of the license tax must be established." Lyons v. Cooper, 39 Kan. 324, syl. 1, 18 Pac. 296. See also Lebanon v. Zanditon, 75 Kan. 273, 275, 89 Pac. 10; Stark v. Geiser, 90 Kan. 504, 506, 135 Pac. 666.

Whatever natural right a citizen may have to traverse the streets of his city with a motor vehicle for the conveyance of his family or his friends, no inherent right exists to devote his vehicle to the public use of carrying passengers for hire, and to appropriate to himself the use of all the streets for purposes of profit.

Beyond question, the city could vacate one or more of the streets over which he might desire to operate. It cannot only require him to pay a license tax, but it may also regulate the manner of his carrying on his enterprise. Why may it not classify motor vehicles by themselves, and refuse to permit them to crowd congested portions of the business streets where patrons of another class of vehicles—street cars—must alight and take passage? Suppose, indeed, a company or corporation owning motor vehicles had the facilities and the desire to occupy all the streets to the utter destruction of the street car business. Would the city have nothing to say? Is the municipality a mere automaton, helpless in the presence of crowding and conflicting enterprises and scrambles for business which involve the comfort, the convenience, and the safety of the traveling public? Not so.

The power to regulate livery and sales stables has been held to include the right to designate their location and to prohibit their erection at other places. St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 20 L.R.A. 721, 22 S. W. 470. In licensing the use of vehicles on streets it has been held that the city is exercising its police, and not its taxing, power. Tomlinson v. Indianapolis, 144 Ind. 142, 43 N. E. 9, 36 L.R.A. 413, and note as to authority of municipalities. It was held by the Texas court of criminal appeals in Ex parte Savage, 63 Tex. Crim. Rep. 285, 141 S. W. 244, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 951, that an ordinance, providing for an official bill poster, who shall have the sole power to post bills and advertisements, does not violate the Texas statute against monopolies. While denying the validity of the particular ordinance in question, for other reasons, it was declared that the city might regulate the erection and maintenance of billboards and prevent the maintenance of others, except as authorized substantially by the ordinance, and require persons, before pursuing such business, to procure proper license therefor. In McFall v. St. Louis, 232 Mo. 716, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 471, 135 S. W. 51, an ordinance was upheld which licensed hack drivers who could procure the consent of abutting property owners, and denied the same privilege to those who could not obtain such consent. As to the power of the city to establish exclusive hack stands, see note in 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 471. Many exclusive franchises are held not to be unlawful, although creating legal monopolies. 27 Cyc. 896. In the case of Re William Hoffert, 34 S. D. 271, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 949, 148 N. W. 20, the statute under consideration imposed a registration fee of $6 on all motor vehicles used upon the public highways of the state, 12½ per cent thereof to be forwarded to the secretary of state, the remainder to be placed in the county motor vehicle road fund and expended only for the repair and maintenance of public highways beyond the limits of cities and towns. The power of the legislature to impose this license in addition to an ad valorem tax was upheld. The road tax of 87½ per cent was held to be a proper charge for the privilege of using such vehicles upon the public highway; also that the placing of self-driven vehicles in a class by themselves is not an unlawful discrimination. The footnote—page 949 of 52 L.R.A.(N.S.)—has numerous recent decisions touching the control and classification of motor vehicles upon public highways. The city of San Antonio passed an ordinance regulating the operation of street cars, jitneys, motor omnibuses, and other vehicles using its streets for local street transportation. The court exhaustively discussed the power of cities to control such transportation. It seems that the particular provision complained of was one requiring a bond for the protection of citizens, and in an opinion denying a rehearing it was said: "Appellant desired to use the streets for private purposes of gain, and the city has the absolute right to prohibit the use of the streets for his private business, and, in case it gave permission for such use, had the right to compel the payment of a license fee." Greene v. San Antonio, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 178 S. W. 6, 11.

Certified copies of opinions of the supreme court of Tennessee in Memphis Street R. Co. v. Rapid Transit Co. — Tenn. —, L.R.A. 1916B, 1143, P.U.R.1916A, 834, 179 S. W. 635, and Memphis v. State, — Tenn. —, L.R.A.1916B, 1151, P.U.R.1916A, 825, 179 S. W. 631, have been furnished. These decisions, recently rendered, validate the statute of Tennessee, declaring those operating jitneys to be common carriers, and that their operation should be unlawful within incorporated cities or towns without first obtaining a permanent license under ordinances from such city or town, and that no such license should be issued unless the owner should file with the clerk of the county court a bond of not less than $5,000 to cover loss of life or injury to person or property inflicted by such carrier or caused by his negligence, and that such license should embody such rights, terms, and conditions as the city or town might elect to impose. Complaint was made because the city of Memphis had passed an ordinance pursuant to this statute, but the court said it was very clear then that the defendant had no right whatever to do business on the streets of Memphis. In the first of the cases mentioned, it was held that the street railway company could enjoin the jitney owners from operating upon the streets without license. In the other, the city prosecuted for violation of the statute, and the defendant sought release by writ of habeas corpus. The same conclusion was reached as to the validity of the enactment, and the opinion contains a thorough discussion of the recent development of jitney transportation and the propriety of separate classification. In Ex parte Dickey, — W. Va. —, L.R.A.1915F, 840, P.U.R.1915E, 93, 85 S. E. 781, the city of Huntington, through its commissioners, passed an ordinance for the regulation and licensing of "jitney buses," the licenses being graded somewhat on the capacity of the vehicles, requiring a bond of $5,000 to pay all lawful claims for damages, the commission reserving to itself the right to refuse or grant such license as applied for, or to change the route or hours set forth in the application, and then granting the license upon such changed route or hours or both. It was held that one who makes the highway his place of business and uses the streets for his private gain in running a stagecoach or omnibus may be utterly denied such right, or that it may be permitted to some and denied to others. In the opinion it was said: "Conveyances on the streets, for the use of the general public, are of the same character, and, in addition to this, cabs, hackney coaches, omnibuses, taxicabs, and hacks, when unnecessarily numerous, interfere with ordinary traffic and travel and obstruct them. Prescription of routes or places of business for them is a fair, reasonable, and efficacious means of preventing such results. . . . They are engaged in a public service which the legislature may always regulate." p. 849 of L.R.A.1915F.

The foregoing serve to demonstrate the principle which must control.

In view of all the facts and circumstances, it would be difficult to find an expression more apt than the following from the decision in the case of Re Martin, 62 Kan. 638, 640, 64 Pac. 43, 44: "There is unquestioned power in the legislature to impose a license tax on occupations, whether it be laid for regulation or purposes of revenue. . . . Being a license tax, the express constitutional restrictions as to equality and uniformity of rate do not apply, and the L.R.A.1916D.

amount of the tax, as well as the method of imposing it, is left to legislative judgment and discretion. . . . If the license tax imposed were flagrantly unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, courts might properly interfere; but we have no such case before us." p. 640.

The trial court denied the injunction sought by the plaintiff. The requirement of § 4 is within the power of the municipality, and the judgment is affirmed.

Porter, J., dissenting:

Believing that the judgment in this case is wrong, I am compelled to dissent; and, because the decision is far-reaching in its results and of more than ordinary importance to the public, I feel it my duty to state the grounds upon which I dissent.

Most that is said in the majority opinion respecting the power of the city to regulate the operation of jitneys and their use of the streets, and to impose a reasonable occupation tax, is, I think, beside the mark. This is obvious from the fact that no contention to the contrary is made by the plaintiffs. In their briefs plaintiffs concede that the city may even forbid the operation of jitneys upon certain streets in case the safety of the public requires it. Moreover, at the oral presentation, counsel for the street railway company, who argued the case for the city, frankly stated their contention to be that the city possessed the power to enact the ordinance for the express purpose of preventing competition in the business of the street railway, if such competition would, in the opinion of the city commissioners, result in the destruction of its business, or deprive it of sufficient revenue to enable it to furnish adequate service to the public. Although the majority opinion starts out with the concession that § 4 of the ordinance was enacted for the purpose of prohibiting jitneys from operating on certain streets in the city, decisions are cited to the effect that the presumption is that the city acted with a good intent. Since the intent is known and conceded on all sides to have been to prevent jitneys from competing with the street railway, we do not need the aid of any presumption as to its character.

The sole question we have to determine is this: Has the city the power to enact an ordinance forbidding jitneys to operate upon any street occupied by the tracks of a street railway? It is even narrower than I have stated it. The real question is, Has the city the power to enact such an ordinance for the sole purpose of preventing competition in the business of the street railway? If it has, then it follows that the city may prohibit the owners of hacks, omnibuses, taxicabs, and carriages of any kind from using any street to transport persons from one part of the city to another for hire on the ground that the best interests of the city are subserved by giving to the street railway company an exclusive right to transport passengers.

The majority opinion cites authorities to the effect that many exclusive franchises are held not to be unlawful, though creating monopolies. None of the authorities cited goes so far as to intimate that a city, under the guise of attempting to regulate one business, could add anything to the rights and privileges of another business which a utility corporation carries on under an existing franchise. The city of Wichita is under the commission form of government, and the statute governing such cities prohibits the amendment of any existing grant, right, privilege, or franchise except by an ordinance, which, under certain conditions, must be submitted to the electors of the city. Gen. Stat. 1909, § 1330. Moreover, it must be obvious that even where a city grants an exclusive right to a street railway, it could not, if it would, give to the company the exclusive right to the use of the entire streets, nor forbid the public to use the portion of the streets not occupied by the railway. Suppose a company carrying on the transfer business in a city should complain that its investment was being ruined by competition of private persons who used motor cars and offered the public quicker service at cheaper prices. Could the city, under the guise of "regulation," but solely to protect the business of the corporation, enact an ordinance prohibiting the individuals from using the portions of the streets adjacent to railway stations to solicit business? Would the fact that the corporation was operating under a franchise giving it special privileges and requiring it to pay to the city a share of its receipts make any difference? These questions are easily answered when it is remembered for what purpose the streets and highways are established.

The question is asked in the majority opinion: "Why may it [the city] not classify motor vehicles by themselves and refuse to permit them to crowd congested portions of the business streets where patrons of another class of vehicles—street cars—must alight and take passage?"

The difficulty is that that is not the question. Plaintiffs, who sought to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance, frankly concede the power of the city to regulate the business and to classify motor-driven vehicles by themselves. The question whether the city has the power to enact reasonable provisions designed to prevent the crowding of congested portions of the business streets is not involved directly or indirectly in the case.

There is no analogy applicable to this case which can be drawn from the principle decided in Schaake v. Dolley, 85 Kan. 598, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877, 118 Pac. 80, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 254. There the court upheld the power of the state bank commissioner to refuse a charter for a new bank in a community where, in his judgment, the banks already in existence were amply able to care for all the business. The streets of a city are highways for the use of all the public. The city cannot, except for the purpose of reasonable regulation, prohibit the public from the use of the streets. While it may, by ordinance, prohibit heavy traffic on particular streets, its ordinance must be reasonable; and where an ordinance, otherwise reasonable in this respect, denies to an abutting lot owner reasonable access to his property, it has been held void. Brown v. Nichols, 93 Kan. 737, L.R.A.1915D, 327, 145 Pac. 561. In the opinion Mr. Chief Justice Johnston said: "The streets are provided for the public in general for purposes of travel and transportation" (p. 739),—and cited the case of Bogue v. Bennett, 156 Ind. 478, 83 Am. St. Rep. 212, 60 N. E. 143, holding void a city ordinance which prohibited traction engines and vehicles not propelled by animal power from using the streets. The Indiana court used this language: "But vehicles, whether moved by animal, steam, or other power, which do not require a specially constructed track, may be run upon the streets and alleys of a municipal corporation without first obtaining the consent of the governing body thereof." Page 486 of 156 Ind.

Another question asked in the majority opinion is this: "Would the city have nothing to say" if "a company or corporation owning motor vehicles had the facilities and the desire to occupy all the streets to the utter destruction of the street car business?"

The obvious answer is, Nothing whatever beyond the right to provide reasonable regulations of the new business. The city has not been made in any sense the guardian of the interests of the owners and stockholders of the street railway company, nor charged with the duty of protecting the company from competition, even though new and improved methods of transporting passengers in cities may, and possibly will in the near future, result in "the utter destruction" of the business of street railways. In the language of Judge Cooley: "When the highway is not restricted in its dedication to some particular mode of use, it is open to all suitable methods; and it cannot be assumed that these will be the same from age to age, or that new means of making the way useful must be excluded merely because their introduction may tend to the inconvenience, or even to the injury, of those who continue to use the road after the same manner as formerly. A highway established for the general benefit of passage and traffic must admit of new methods of use whenever it is found that the general benefit requires them; and, if the law should preclude the adaptation of the use to the new methods, it would defeat, in greater or less degree, the purpose for which highways are established." Macomber v. Nichols, 34 Mich. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 522.

Twenty-five years ago, when electricity was first demonstrated to be practical and economical for operating street cars, millions had been already invested in cable car systems, with miles of expensive tunnels in the center of the streets. Competing companies on nearby streets installed trolley lines. No one supposed it was the duty of the municipalities to place obstacles in the way of the public getting immediate benefit of the new and improved method of transportation, although the competition resulted in sending most of the machinery of the cable companies to the junk pile. To quote again from Judge Cooley: "Improved methods of locomotion are perfectly admissible, if any shall be discovered, and they cannot be excluded from the existing public roads, providing their use is consistent with the present methods. A highway is a public way for the use of the public in general, for passage and traffic, without distinction. Starr v. Camden & A. R. Co. 24 N. J. L. 592. The restrictions upon its use are only such as are calculated to secure to the general public the largest practicable benefit from the enjoyment of the easement, and the inconveniences must be submitted to when they are only such as are incident to a reasonable use under impartial regulations." Macomber v. Nichols, supra. (Italics ours.)

It is said that in 1845, after the introduction of steam to transportation and machinery, a clerk in the Patent Office asked to be transferred to some other department because the field of discovery and invention had been exhausted. The other day Edison, speaking of electrical inventions, said, "The surface of things has only been scratched over," and he predicted wonderful developments in the uses of electricity within the next ten years.

On the 29th of last month the supreme court of Louisiana, in the case of New Orleans v. Le Blanc, 71 So. 248,<sup>1</sup> held an ordinance purporting to regulate the jitney business void for the reason that its provisions were found to be arbitrary and prohibitive. In the opinion it was said: "The jitneys are automobiles, and therefore are entitled to use the streets as matter of right, but they are automobiles used in a peculiar way, which sets them apart in a class by themselves, a fact well recognized the country over. And if, owing to this special use, special regulation is necessary for the safety and convenience of the other users of the street, such special regulation is justified, and the question of what it shall consist of is a matter within the discretion of the municipal authorities, with which the courts have no right to interfere in the absence of clear abuse. Prohibition, however, is not regulation, and if, under the guise of a regulation, a measure be in fact a prohibition, it transcends the municipal power." (Italics ours.)

Most of the cases cited in the briefs of defendants go no further than to hold that a city may pass ordinances regulating the jitney business. Many of them expressly deny the power to prohibit the business altogether. I do not cite them, since they are not the decisions of courts of last resort. The recent decision of the supreme court of Tennessee, referred to in the majority opinion, in no manner involves the question whether a city, under its general grant of power over streets, or in the exercise of its police power, or under what is termed a "general welfare clause," may enact an ordinance prohibiting jitneys from using the public streets. That decision is based solely upon a recent statute enacted by the legislature, requiring jitneys, before being permitted to operate on the streets of any city, to furnish surety company bonds in the sum of $5,000 to indemnify persons who might be injured by the operation of the jitneys.

The court should take judicial notice of the fact that the operation of jitneys, though of very recent origin, is by no means confined to cities. On the contrary, in the more densely populated places of the country jitneys are operated between cities and in rural districts. If a city, solely in the interest of a street railway company, may prohibit jitneys from using the streets to compete with the business of the company, I can see no reason why the legislature, if it see fit, may not protect the capital invested in interurban trolley lines, and, solely for that purpose, prohibit jitneys from using the public highways to carry passengers from town to town. That the legislature has not authorized a city to do this is sufficient reason why the recent Tennessee decision should not be followed; and until the cold day comes when the legislature of Kansas passes an act attempting to profect investment in street railways by giving them the exclusive right to carry passengers on public highways, or authorizing cities to give them such a monopoly of the streets, I think the courts should declare such an ordinance unreasonable, oppressive, and therefore void.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Chief Justice Johnston concurs in this dissent.

Mr. J. L. Heiss for appellee.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the circuit court of Harrison county, from a judgment in the sum of $750 in favor of appellee, who was plaintiff in the trial court against the defendants, appellants here.

The plaintiff filed his original declaration, to which the defendants demurred, and the demurrer was overruled, whereupon the plaintiff filed an amended declaration and the defendants interposed the same demurrer, which was likewise overruled. The defendants then filed a special plea, to which the plaintiff interposed a general demurrer, which demurrer was sustained. The defendants thereupon declined to plead further, and a writ of inquiry was awarded, and damages in the sum of $750 assessed in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants.

The plaintiff in his amended declaration alleged that the defendant Gulf & Ship Island Railroad company was a common carrier, and operated a railroad extending from Jackson, Mississippi, in a southerly direction to the south end of its pier, or wharf, located in the harbor of Gulfport; that the southern end of said pier or wharf was the southern terminus of the said railroad and a part of its common carrier system, and had always been so held out to the public, and that the public had a right to ship commodities over its track extending to the end of the pier, and from thence to be transported for further carriage by such vessels as the shipper might engage for such service. The Gulfport Shipping Company, one of the defendants, according to the allegations in the declarations, was a partnership concern, domiciled at Gulfport, and professed to be engaged in the general business of engaging freight, but was "in fact and truth the Gulf & Ship Island Railroad Company, operating under the above-styled name for the purposes hereinafter named."

The declaration alleged that J. W. Corry & Company, also a defendant, was a corporation domiciled at Gulfport, and engaged in the general business of ship brokers, which business consists of making freight engagements and contracts of every kind for transportation by water at said port. The plaintiff then alleged "that prior to his undertaking, hereinafter mentioned," he had been, for some forty years, engaged in the business of general ship broker and ship agent in the city of New Orleans, during which time he had built up an "extensive and valuable acquaintance and connection for said business in this and in foreign lands, and was extensively known and trusted as being thoroughly qualified for the business."

The plaintiff then charged that when he first established himself in the business of ship broker and agent at Gulfport, he was given assurances by the railroad company, through its vice president and its general freight and passenger agent, that the railroad company would welcome him and afford every facility and accommodation necessary to the establishment of the business, and would furnish him rates therefor at his request, and that, relying thereon, he began the establishment of his business by soliciting business from various points in this state and beyond for the shipment of cotton, cotton seed meal, cotton seed cake, staves, and other merchandise, and did secure offers of cargoes for shipment by water from Gulfport, and did secure offers of steamship and sailing vessel rates for the transportation of same from said pier and wharf at acceptable rates. The plaintiff then charged that about the time he had completed his arrangements, the defendants "did conspire, confederate, and agree among themselves to perfect a monopoly of all the export and import business from the harbor of Gulfport, on merchandise other than lumber and naval stores, in this, that the defendant railroad company had heretofore, to wit, during the year of 1909, made a formal and pretended lease of the greater portion of the available free space on said wharf to the said J. W. Corry & Company for the erection of said warehouses or sheds thereon in the name of the said J. W. Corry & Company, while in fact said sheds were erected for or by said railroad company with the distinct agreement and understanding that said lease should, within a short time agreed upon, be transferred back to the said railroad company, which was thereafter done; that thereafter, to wit, during the early part of 1910, as a part of said agreed plan, the said railroad company, through its president and other officials, organized the said Gulfport Shipping Company, and owned and controlled same, having for its officers the said certain officials of said railroad and its confidential men, and that the said arrangement as thus completed was for the purpose of effecting a monopoly upon all said business at said pier, and thereby to exclude all competition as to rates and vessels, so as to fix said rates free from competition and to preserve to themselves all the profits therefrom; that as a part of said preconceived scheme, plan, and agreement, the Gulfport Shipping Company, upon its organization, made the said J. W. Corry & Company its exclusive agent and its control in all business of said character at said port.

Plaintiff further alleged that thereafter he endeavored to secure rates from the defendants on merchandise for export, and endeavored to procure facilities upon the wharf for handling the same similar to facilities afforded Corry & Company; that these facilities were denied on the ground that the exclusive rights to same belonged to Corry & Company, and that they would not be shared with plaintiff, who was a competitor of Corry & Company, that in May, 1910, plaintiff sought business from A. Le More & Company, of New Orleans, but that an agent of the defendant railroad company wrote said firm that the Gulfport Shipping Company was a proper party to handle the shipment, and that the refusal of the wharf facilities to the plaintiff prevented him from securing this business; that a similar situation prevented plaintiff from making a shipment of 2,000 tons of cotton seed cakes from Gulfport in 1910; that the denial of facilities aforesaid prevented plaintiff from engaging in the business of ship broker; and that the defendants had conspired and confederated against him, and had violated the statutes of Mississippi prohibiting trusts and combines; and damages were asked for, actual and punitive, in the sum of $10,000.

To this declaration the defendant filed a demurrer setting up the following grounds: (a) The commerce shown by the declaration in which the plaintiff was to be engaged was interstate. (b) It was necessary for all complaints with reference to discrimination in the movement of interstate commerce to be first presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission. (c) No suit of any kind can be maintained for an alleged discrimination with reference to the movement of interstate commerce until the question of discrimination has been submitted to and passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission. (d) In no event has this court the jurisdiction to try and determine the issues here involved.

That the defendant railroad company had adequate terminal facilities in the city of Gulfport for the receipt and delivery of merchandise committed to it for transportation and delivery to the city of Gulfport, and that, while there is a physical connection by rail between its depots and yards and wharves referred to in the declaration, and while the railroad company is authorized and empowered by its charter to locate, construct, and thereafter to own and maintain and use suitable wharves, piers, breakwaters, bases, and depots and other appurtenances thereon for loading and unloading, receiving and discharging, freight and passengers from or to sea-going, lightering, and coasting vessels, neither the provisions of the charter nor any statutory law compels or requires, or did compel or require, the railroad to construct and maintain the wharf mentioned in plaintiff's declaration; that the wharf so referred to was constructed by the railroad company at an expense of several hundred thousand dollars, and was maintained at an enormous expense; and that the wharf was constructed for the purpose of procuring the transportation of goods beyond its own line in connection with such ocean carriers as it might select with which jointly to issue through export bills of lading from interior points to foreign destinations, but that no other business was ever done at the wharf except the transportation by the railroad company in cars on its railroad of articles of commerce to and from vessels lying at the said wharf, and of commerce brought to or to be transported by such vessels, and the loading and unloading of same into and from said vessels.

Defendants further allege in the special plea that after the construction of the wharf in question, the railroad company promulgated its rules and regulations, by which it was expressly provided that the wharf was the private property of the Gulf & Ship Island Railroad Company, and that vessels would be permitted to come and lie at said wharf only upon the consent of the railroad company, according to its rules and regulations promulgated from time to time. It was further set up that the wharf was ready for use in the year 1902, and that the rules and regulations above mentioned had been in force and effect continuously from that time up to and including the time mentioned in plaintiff's declaration, and to the present day; that in its rules, the railroad company expressly reserved the right to give preference at its wharf to ships engaged in the transportation of parcel shipments from said port, and that no boats or vessels, for the purpose of taking on or unloading cargoes, had ever been permitted to occupy a berth at said wharves except upon compliance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the railroad company, with the stipulation that the wharves were and are the private property of the railroad company, and that the vessels might tie up to or remain at the wharf only in strict compliance with such rules and regulations; that the recognition of the rules and regulations above mentioned had, at all times, been required before boats were permitted to berth at the wharf, and that the purpose of reserving such preference was the desire and effort of the railroad company to build up the exportation of general cargoes from the port of Gulfport, and to build up this business it was necessary for the railroad company to issue, or have issued, in connection with some ocean carriers, through bills of lading from points of origin to foreign points of destination; that the railroad company, upon issuing the bills of lading mentioned, was liable both to the shippers and consignees for the safe, proper, and prompt transportation of such shipments to foreign destinations; and, because of the responsibility it had assumed, that it was necessary for the railroad company to secure an ocean-carrying agent of such financial strength and with facilities as would be adequate to the successful carrying on of the aforesaid enterprise. It was then alleged that the facilities offered by J. W. Corry & Company appeared to the railroad to be the best, and that Corry & Company was an established carrier of ocean freights, and was financially responsible, and therefore Corry & Company were authorized by the railroad company to occupy the space on the wharf mentioned in plaintiff's declaration, for the purpose of aiding the railroad company in the building up of general cargo shipments for export, and for affording necessary financial protection to the railroad against loss and damage because of the issuance by it of through bills of lading for the movement of such commodities in connection with Corry & Company; that the Gulfport Shipping Company was financially solvent, and was a responsible shipping company, organized for the purpose of enlarging the export movement from Gulfport, and that with the permission of the railroad company it acquired from Corry & Company the rights and privileges as to space and warehouses and berths for vessels that had previously been granted Corry & Company; and that the shipping company carried out the business arrangement theretofore existing between Corry & Company and the railroad company for export movements of commerce. The plea then sets out that the plaintiff was engaged in the business of ocean freight carrying, but that he was not satisfactory to the defendant for the issuance of through export bills of lading in connection with the movement of foreign commerce, but that, through the agency of Corry & Company and the Gulfport Shipping Company, the railroad company was enabled to and did receive all commodities for export desiring an outlet through the harbor of Gulfport, and that the movement of same was in no wise hindered, obstructed, or delayed because of any arrangement existing between the defendants for the movement of commodities by water from the port of Gulfport.

According to the allegations of the special plea, the space allotted Corry & Company occupied approximately 500 feet at the south end of the pier, and that there remained outside of this 500 feet an additional space of approximately 2,200 feet, to which, under the rules and regulations of the railroad company, vessels other than general cargo vessels were permitted to occupy berths and take on cargoes; that there were at the times alleged in the plaintiff's declaration, and still are, many shippers in connection with whom no through export bills of lading are issued by the defendant, exporting through the port of Gulfport, who charter and own vessels and procure ocean transportation for their export products; that in such instances the shippers load directly from the cars upon which the export commodities were placed alongside the various ships, and that shipments so made are designated "full cargo shipments;" that the "full cargo shipments" constituted a large part of the export movement from Gulfport, and that vessels carrying "full cargo shipments," upon being chartered, and the rules and regulations promulgated by the railroad company subscribed to, were and now are assigned berths at said wharf, each vessel in its regular turn, and that the plaintiff was given the opportunity, so far as "full cargo shipments" were concerned, upon subscribing to the rules and regulations, of having vessels occupy berths at the wharf in the same manner and to the same extent that were offered other shippers of "full cargo shipments."

It was further alleged that there was no other space or room to apportion to the plaintiff, or anyone else, for the purpose of storage, except at an inconvenience and loss to merchants engaged in "full cargo shipments," or the lessening of the space allotted Corry & Company and the Gulfport Shipping Company for parcel shipments, and that as to parcel shipments moving through the port of Gulfport, the facilities and advantages of the space and wharves occupied by Corry & Company and the Gulfport Shipping Company were offered alike and without discrimination to all shippers and to all available points, and that Corry & Company and the Gulfport Shipping Company received and transmitted on equal terms all shipments of commodities moving through Gulfport, destined to foreign ports. The defendant then denied that it was under any legal obligation to furnish plaintiff the facilities alleged in his declaration to have been denied.

The plaintiff then filed a general demurrer to the above plea, and the demurrer was sustained. The defendant declined to plead further, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The questions we have to determine are: First, whether this court has jurisdiction, or whether this is a matter within the exclusive control of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and, secondly, whether the special plea set out above constituted a good defense to plaintiff's declaration. It is strongly urged by the defendant railroad company that this is a matter over which the state courts have no jurisdiction, and that the determination as to whether the matters complained of in the plaintiff's declaration were or were not an unjust discrimination is for the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not the courts; that the commerce in question comes within the classification of commerce which is subject by the act to regulate commerce, passed by Congress, to the control and direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, likewise, the subject-matter of the controversy, the wharves of the railroad company and its practices relating thereto, for the reason that they are facilities used in connection with the movement of interstate and foreign commerce, are likewise embraced in the act to regulate commerce, and subject to the supervision and jurisdiction exclusively of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In our opinion, this contention is not well founded. As stated in the able brief of counsel for appellee in this case: "It has been repeatedly held by the United States Supreme Court that only those matters must first come before the Interstate Commerce Commission which involve administrative functions, such as rates, switching facilities, the rate of distribution of cars, and similar questions of practice; that the Commission did not first have to pass upon those questions which constituted a violation or denial of unquestioned legal duties of giving service as a common carrier per se. The Commission was given exclusive jurisdiction of administrative matters for the reason that therein they were not deciding questions of law, or judicial questions, but questions of the reasonableness of rules, procedure, and business supervision on which opinions might well differ; and therefore, to prevent contrary holdings on similar questions and to insure uniformity, the court holds the Commission's jurisdiction on such matters to be exclusive. To permit different courts or bodies to pass upon such questions might result in what one would hold reasonable on questions of rates, facilities, switching charges, or car service, etc., another might hold unreasonable, thereby creating the discrimination that the act sought to avoid."

Not only does the declaration in this case charge a discrimination in favor of Corry & Company and the Gulfport Shipping Company, but it also charges a conspiracy to monopolize the business in which plaintiff was engaged, contrary to the anti-trust laws of this state. As to whether or not a violation of the anti-trust statutes is presented is clearly a matter within the province of this court to inquire into; and, for that purpose, it undoubtedly has jurisdiction.

We now come to the question of whether or not the special plea of defendant was a sufficient defense at law to plaintiff's declaration, and this resolves itself into the question of whether or not the defendant was justifiable in refusing facilities to the appellee for the purpose of storing freight on its wharf that it afforded to Corry & Company; for there is no question in this case with reference to any refusal on the part of the railroad company to receive any freight offered it for transportation, and there is no complaint that any discrimination between shippers has been made. The special plea sets up that all persons desiring to make shipments were afforded the same services and the same rates by the railroad company, which owned and controlled the wharf. The special plea sets up that adequate depots and yards were furnished by the railroad in the city of Gulfport for the receipt and delivery of merchandise committed to it for transportation; that the wharves in question were its private property and constructed and maintained by it at great cost; that the wharves were constructed for the purpose of more conveniently transporting commerce beyond its own line in connection with such ocean carriers as it might select with which to issue through bills of lading, and that no other business had been done at that wharf except transportation in connection therewith; that at no time had the use of the wharf been permitted except upon the distinct understanding of the shippers and owners that the wharf was a private wharf, and that in accordance with the rules regularly adopted by the railroad company that certain kinds of vessels and certain kinds of cargoes were to have preferred space and facilities; that the commerce carried on in connection with Corry & Company was of the kind for which a preference was intended and made. In the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. West Coast Naval Stores Co. 198 U. S. 483, 49 L. ed. 1135, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 745, the Supreme Court of the United States says:

"We do not see that the fact that the wharf was erected under authority from the city, at the foot of a public street of the city, makes any material difference in the character of the wharf, or that the right of plaintiff to select its own vessels to continue from that wharf the transportation of its goods is, on that ground, enhanced, or the right of defendant to control the wharf for its own use when erected is thereby diminished. The right to erect the wharf was granted by the proper authorities, and, so far as the record shows, it was granted without imposing any conditions as to its use by the public. We think the plaintiff had no right of access to the wharf founded simply upon the fact that it was erected under proper authority, in the harbor of Pensacola, and at the foot of one of the public streets of that city. The question of the rights of plaintiff must really turn upon the character of the use of the wharf, whether it is public or private.

"The argument upon the part of plaintiff is, in substance, this: True, defendant has erected a wharf which is not in fact intended or used as the terminus of its road at Pensacola, adequate yards and depots having been furnished by the defendant for all goods and passengers destined to Pensacola only; but the wharf has been erected to enable defendant to more conveniently carry out contracts for transportation beyond its own line, which it was not compelled to make, and which it could carry out by such agencies as it chose; but the plaintiff, having goods destined for points outside of Florida, insists upon its right to use the road of defendant, not to carry these goods to Pensacola, but to defendant's wharf, so that plaintiff may there transfer them into vessels which it has arranged to take them; in order to do this it is necessary that defendant be compelled to share its possession of its own wharf with the managers of these other vessels; for this possession plaintiff is prepared to make reasonable compensation. This right on the part of the plaintiff is urged as the result of the action of defendant in permitting the use of the wharf as stated in the plea. By such use it is contended that the defendant in effect dedicated the wharf to the public, or at least has granted to the public an interest in the use of the wharf. We are of opinion that the wharf was not a public one, but that it was a mere facility, erected by and belonging to L.R.A.1916D.

defendant, and used by it, in connection with that part of its road forming an extension from its regular depot and yards in Pensacola, to the wharf, for the purpose of more conveniently procuring the transportation of goods beyond its own line; and that defendant need not share such facility with the public or with any carriers other than those it chose for the purpose of effecting such further transportation. Neither the public nor the plaintiff had such an interest in the wharf as would give to either the right to demand its use on payment of reasonable hire. Nor was the wharf a depot or place of storage of the defendant for goods to be delivered at or taken from the city of Pensacola for transportation by rail. The defendant had adequate depots and yards in that city for the proper storage of all merchandise committed to it for delivery at Pensacola, or there received, to be transported therefrom by defendant. All consignees of goods at Pensacola had equal facilities for obtaining them there."

The principle was laid down, in what are known as the Express Cases, 117 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 791, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 542, 628, that railroad companies have the right to contract with particular express companies for the transportation of traffic over their railroads, and that the railroad company was not bound to transport the traffic of an independent express company over its lines in the same manner in which it transported the traffic of the particular company contracted with; in other words, that the railroad company was not bound to furnish, in the absence of statutes, to all independent express companies, equal facilities for doing an express business upon its passenger trains.

The case of Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Crawford, 107 Miss. 355, L.R.A.1915C, 250, 65 So. 462, decides the principle of law involved in this case. In that case it was decided that a railroad company, having made a contract with one log-loading company to the exclusion of other companies engaged in a like business, to load its cars, did not violate the anti-trust statutes, and that this contract did not constitute an illegal monopoly. The court in that case said: "We are of opinion that the contract made with the Valley Log Loading Company under the circumstances was not an illegal contract. The arrangement which the railroad company had made with reference to the loading of logs and furnishing to parties its cars, engines, and crews was not in any sense a function or duty required of the company in its capacity as a common carrier. There was no legal obligation resting upon the railroad company to furnish its cars, engines, and crews to individuals carrying on a log-loading business, or to receive logs to be loaded on its cars along the right of way between stations. The railroad company could itself have undertaken this to the exclusion of everybody else. This is not controverted. It would then monopolize the business in a sense, but not illegally. In the case of Houck v. Wright, 77 Miss. 483, 27 So. 617, this court says: 'The legislature, by the chapter on Trusts and Combines, did not intend to debar a person from conducting his own private business according to his own judgment.' It was not the purpose to limit either the term used in the Constitution or in the statute by any narrow definition, but leave it to the courts to look beneath the surface, and from the methods employed in the conduct of his business to determine whether the association or combine in question, no matter what its particular form should chance to be, or what might be its constituent elements, is taking advantage of the public in an unlawful way. This case and this extract from it were cited with approval of this court in the case of the Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. State, 100 Miss. 116, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 277, 54 So. 670."

There is no complaint in this case that every shipper did not enjoy the same rights and privileges that were extended to every other shipper. The plea shows that the shipping public enjoyed the entire rights upon the wharf, and the small shippers not having enough cargo for an entire ship, by means of concentrations upon the pier, or by pooling freight, could make parcel shipments, and in so doing avail themselves of the benefits of the market; and the railroad company allotted on the wharf the space in question for this purpose. No discrimination of any kind is charged with reference to any shipments of freight offered to the railroad company at the wharf.

In our opinion, the railroad company had the right, to the exclusion of everyone else, to have undertaken to store the parcels received at its wharf at Gulfport for shipment; and it could have made the contracts of shipment of same with vessels of its own choosing, to the exclusion of everyone else. In view of the fact that the railroad company had the right to carry on this business in the manner in which it was carried on through its own servants, it is clear to us that it would have the right likewise to carry on the same business in the same way through the agency of Corry & Company and the Gulfport Shipping Company. The special plea sets up a sufficient defense to plaintiff's declaration. This cause is therefore reversed and remanded.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this cause a demurrer to the declaration was sustained by the circuit judge, and the court of civil appeals on appeal affirmed the ruling.

In the declaration it was averred that in March, 1896, plaintiff and her husband became the owners as tenants by the entirety of a tract of 105 acres; that in June, 1887, plaintiff became the owner, to her sole and separate use, of a tract of 25 acres lying opposite the 105-acre tract and separated from it only by a public turnpike; that the plaintiff's residence is located on the smaller tract; that the two tracts were and had been continuously used and operated together, or as one farm; and that the residence, barn, and servants' houses situated on the one are supplied with water by means of a reservoir located on the other tract.

It was further averred that the railway company had instituted a proceeding to condemn a strip through the larger tract as a right of way, and that for the value of that strip and for incidental damages to the remainder of that 105-acre tract plaintiff and her husband, tenants by the entirety, had received payment; but that, under the terms of an agreement in that proceeding, the right was reserved to plaintiff to claim in a future suit incidental damages to the smaller tract, so individually owned by plaintiff. The present action was thereupon brought for this purpose.

The demurrer set forth two grounds: (1) That plaintiff's land was not shown to be a part of the tract, a portion of which was taken for the right of way; and (2) that the title to land as to which damages are now claimed was in plaintiff, and the title to the 105-acre tract subjected to the easement was vested in her and her husband, and that, the ownership being thus variant, the claim of damages could not be supported.

In our opinion a decision on the last point will be determinative of the question of liability, and we shall not discuss the first.

As we consider, the case of plaintiff must be viewed as if her claim to damages to the smaller tract were being urged in the condemnation proceeding that affected the larger tract. The damages of the character claimed can only be such as are incident to the taking of a part of the latter tract for a railway right of way.

The authorities are surprisingly few that deal with the question of an allowance of incidental damages to the owner of an adjoining tract where the title-holding of the same is not identical with that of the lands affected by the actual condemnation-taking, both of which tracts are claimed to be actually used as one.

In Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Conness, 184 Ill. 178, 56 N. E. 402, it was held, where a strip of land was condemned wholly within a quarter section owned by a person in fee, that the owner might also recover for injury to his interest as a tenant in common of a remainder estate in an adjoining quarter section. On a second appeal of the case, the interference with the operation of the two sections as one farm was urged as a ground of relief (Conness v. Indiana, I. & I. L.R.A.1916D).

R. Co. 193 Ill. 464, 62 N. E. 221), and it was further held that the jury could not take into consideration the fact that the right of way would divide the two sections so as to render difficult of access to the owners of the quarter held in fee to wells and buildings located on the quarter in which his interest was one as tenant in common in remainder. It was said that the jury must not take into account the fact that the right of way divided the two interests, but must consider each as if they were standing alone, or "as if the other of the two interests belonged to an entire stranger." Yet a judgment for some damage to the untouched quarter section was allowed to stand, but that appears to have been based on a provision of the Constitution of Illinois, and this particular ruling makes the case an inapplicable precedent in this state.

In Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Dresel, 110 Ill. 89, it appeared: Dresel was in the possession of lots 2 to 15, inclusive, cultivated by him as a whole as a flower garden. Lots 2 to 9 were held under a lease. Lots 10 to 15 were owned by him in fee. The strip sought to be condemned was off of the leased lots, and it was attempted to be subjected as a part of a leasehold interest. His residence and barn were upon lots 14 and 15.

Instructions of the trial judge to the jury were approved which went on the theory that if the lots had a special capacity, as an entirety, for the purpose of flower gardening, and were so used, Dresel could recover for depreciation of the value of the whole for the residue of the lease term. The court said: "Appellant proposed to take a portion of the lots held by the lease. If by so doing the market value of the whole tract was lessened during the two years which appellee had the right to hold and use the same, to that extent he was damaged, and while no part of the lots he owned in fee was taken, still, by the taking, as his property held in fee and by lease was damaged, he, in justice, ought to be entitled to recover so far as the market value of his property was depreciated."

See also in the same connection, Smith County v. Labore, 37 Kan. 480, 15 Pac. 577.

Glendenning v. Stahley, 173 Ind. 674, 91 N. E. 234, dealt with a claim of damages incident to the laying out of a public highway. Glendenning owned an 80-acre tract lying immediately north of the highway, and he and his wife as tenants by entirety owned a 20-acre tract lying directly south of the road. It was sought to show the market value of the 20 acres, considered in connection with, because used along with, the 80-acre tract, as at the time farmed. The trial court excluded the offered testimony, saying: "It is settled that, in determining the amount of special benefits or damages sustained by any one proprietor, all land belonging to him lying in a contiguous body, and used together for a common purpose, will be considered as one tract or farm. . . . This principle cannot be extended to cover lands owned by different proprietors, although contiguous and used under one management and for a common purpose."

In Potts v. Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. 119 Pa. 278, 4 Am. St. Rep. 646, 13 Atl. 291, the land condemned was the individual property of Potts, while the second tract was the property of Potts and another as tenants in common. Held that, notwithstanding a claim of a common use, the assessment of damages should be confined to the lot a portion of which was taken for the railroad's use; "the fee was held and owned by different persons; neither of them could be considered as appurtenant to, or part and parcel of, the other."

Where a leasehold estate was condemned, a claim for damages by the lessee in respect of property owned by him individually, separated from the condemned property by an alley, but used by him in connection with that property in the conduct of his business, was denied. United States v. Inlota, Fed. Cas. No. 15,441a.

The case of Leavenworth, N. & S. R. Co. v. Wilkins, 45 Kan. 674, 26 Pac. 16, relied on by appellee railway company, went off on a question of pleading without the court reaching the particular question of substantive law now under consideration. The case of Smith County v. Labore, supra, was cited, but its ruling on the immediate question was not disapproved.

We think the better rule is that announced in the Indiana and Pennsylvania cases.

In the case at bar we think it quite manifest that plaintiff's claim cannot be supported on principle. The two tracts are held by different titles vested in different persons. Separate condemnation proceedings would be required to condemn a right of way over them, and separate suits would have to be brought for damages by the distinct owners against an appropriator for injuries done the tracts. When we look upon a condemnation as a compulsory sale, made for the parties by the law (Southern R. Co. v. Jennings, 130 Tenn. 450, 171 S. W. 82), L.R.A.1916D.

the law thus would bring the railway in confrontation with two distinct ownerships.

Assume that the plaintiff, Mrs. Tillman, were the owner, as tenant in common, of a one-tenth undivided interest in the larger tract. May it be held that a condemnation affecting that small interest would support the claim here urged for damages done to the entire tract solely owned by her? If so, other such tenants in common owning contiguous tracts individually could do so in like manner, and it is conceivable that if the right of way were taken out of a small boundary so owned in common, surrounded by large tracts severally owned by the tenants in common, enormous damages could be collected from the condemnor under the rule contended for by the appellant.

Let the attitude of the case be reversed, by supposing that plaintiff's individually owned tract had been specially benefited by the construction of the railway over the adjoining tract, but that the balance of the larger tract was incidentally damaged. Would it be either fair or sound to hold that this incidental damage should be offset by the benefits accruing to the smaller tract? Would it not be an abundant reply that mutuality of parties or ownership was lacking to justify such a set-off? We think so.

We think the case has been properly disposed of. Writ of certiorari denied.

Neill, Ch. J., being incompetent, took no part in the decision of this case.

I. E. TROUTNER, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF ARIZONA.

(— Ariz. —, 154 Pac. 1048.)

Intoxicating liquor — sale — ignorance of character — effect.

Ignorance of the character of the liquid, and honest belief in its nonintoxicating character, are no defense to a prosecution for selling intoxicating liquor contrary to a constitutional provision making it a misdemeanor to sell intoxicating liquor of any

(February 10, 1916.)

APPEAL by defendant, from a judgment of the Superior Court for Maricopa County convicting him of selling and disposing of certain intoxicating liquors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. J. Cox and James E. Nelson, for appellant:

Defendant was entitled, under the statute, to the instruction requested by him at the trial.

Patrok v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 587, 76 S. W. 947; Walker v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 495, 98 S. W. 843; McRoberts v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 288, 92 S. W. 804; Mayne v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 93, 86 S. W. 329; Uloth v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 295, 87 S. W. 822; State v. Powell, 141 N. C. 780, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 477, 53 S. E. 515.

Messrs. Wiley E. Jones, Attorney General, Leslie C. Hardy and George W. Harben, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

The courts have held that the sale of a beverage under a mistake or in ignorance of its intoxicating propensities is a defense to a charge of selling intoxicating liquors contrary to law, while some of the courts have announced a different rule.

See State v. Powell, 141 N. C. 780, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 477, 53 S. E. 515; Haynes v. State, 118 Tenn. 709, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559, 121 Am. St. Rep. 1055, 105 S. W. 251, 12 Ann. Cas. 470.

Ross, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was tried and convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of selling, exchanging, giving, bartering, and disposing of certain intoxicating liquors. He was tried by a jury and found guilty. From the judgment of conviction he appeals.

The appellant asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the drink sold in this case was intoxicating as alleged in the information, but still further believe that at the time defendant sold the same he sold it honestly believing it was not intoxicating, then, in such event, the defendant would L.R.A.1916D.

not be guilty, and it will become your duty to acquit him."

This requested instruction was refused by the court, and the jury was told by the court: "That the law of this state does not permit one to sell intoxicating liquor and then be heard to say that he did not know that the liquor was intoxicating. He is bound under the law to know. The law presumes that when he sells liquor he knows what he is selling; that is, whether it is intoxicating or not. The prohibition amendment is intended to prevent any traffic in intoxicating liquors. No excuses are recognized or permitted. If one sells intoxicating liquor, he is liable. It is his duty to know what he sells, and he cannot guess at it or rely upon someone else's statement."

The appellant complains of the court's refusal to give the requested instruction, and of the submission to the jury, as the law of this state, of the converse of the proposition contained in his request.

The prohibition amendment (article 23, § 1) reads: "Every person who sells, exchanges, gives, barters, or disposes of any ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquor of any kind, to any person in the state of Arizona, . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. . . ."

In crimes involving moral turpitude, criminal intent or guilty knowledge is, of course, generally recognized as an essential element. This is true whether the offense be one at common law or by statute. Society has so developed and extended that it has become necessary, in order to protect it, to pass many laws forbidding things to be done or commanding things to be done, the neglect to do or the doing whereof had theretofore been regarded as innocent and permissible. Most crimes falling under this head are designated as malum prohibitum in contradistinction to those crimes that are bad in themselves and in which criminal intent or guilty knowledge is essential.

That the legislature may make the doing of an act or the neglect to do something a crime in the absence of criminal intent is well settled. The intent of the legislature therefore, in any given piece of legislation, is the controlling factor. It is said in 8 R. C. L. 62: "Whether a criminal intent or guilty knowledge is a necessary element of a statutory offense is a matter of construction to be determined from the language of the statute, in view of its manifest purpose and design. There are many instances in recent times where the legislature in the exercise of the police power has prohibited, under penalty, the performance of a specific act. The doing of the inhibited act constitutes the crime, and the moral turpitude or 'purity of the motive by which it was prompted, and knowledge or ignorance of its criminal character, are immaterial circumstances on the question of guilt. The only fact to be determined in these cases is whether the defendant did the act. In the interest of the public the burden is placed upon the actor of ascertaining at his peril whether his deed is within the prohibition of any criminal statute."

In Com. ex rel. Allegheny County v. Weiss, 139 Pa. 247, 11 L.R.A. 530, 23 Am. St. Rep. 182, 21 Atl. 10, the defendant was charged with violating a law forbidding the sale of oleomargarin, and he defended on the ground of ignorance of the nature and quality of the article sold. The court stated the rule we are now considering so well that we quote at some length: "Whether a criminal intent or a guilty knowledge is a necessary ingredient of a statutory offense, therefore, is a matter of construction. It is for the legislature to determine whether the public injury threatened in any particular matter is such and so great as to justify an absolute and indiscriminate prohibition. Even if, in the honest prosecution of any particular trade or business conducted for the manufacture of articles of food, the product is healthful and nutritious, yet, if the opportunities for fraud and adulteration are such as threaten the public health, it is undoubtedly in the power of the legislature either to punish those who knowingly traffic in the fraudulent article, or, by a sweeping provision to that effect, to prohibit the manufacture and sale altogether. The question for us to decide, therefore, is whether or not, from the language of the statute, and in view of the manifest purpose and design of the same, the legislature intended that the legality or illegality of the sale should depend upon the ignorance or knowledge of the party charged. The statute in question was an exercise of the police power, and the act was sustained upon this ground, not only in this court, but also in the Supreme Court of the United States. Powell v. Com. 114 Pa. 265, 60 Am. Rep. 350, 7 Atl. 913, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 32; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257. The prohibition is absolute and general; it could not be expressed in terms more explicit and comprehensive. The statutory definition of the offense embraces no word implying that the forbidden act shall be done knowingly or wilfully, and, if it did, the design and purpose of the act would be practically defeated. The intention of the legislature is plain, that persons engaged in the traffic shall engage in it at their peril, and that they cannot set up their ignorance of the nature and qualities of the commodities they sell as a defense."

ment is "absolute and general." "Every person" who (not he who knowingly or with guilty knowledge) sells intoxicating liquor "shall be guilty." It is all comprehensive,—it excludes none. It makes the act of sale of the forbidden article a crime. He who would avoid any violation of its terms must not sell intoxicating liquor, and, having done the thing forbidden, he may not excuse his act upon ignorance of the fact of its intoxicating quality. He is irrebuttably presumed to know the quality of the article sold, and if it turns out to be intoxicating he may not escape upon the plea of ignorance. To construe the prohibition amendment otherwise we would have to insert words not found therein.

In ascertaining the intent of the lawmaking body in the enactment of this prohibition law, sight of its purpose should not be overlooked. Unquestionably, the purpose was to place a ban upon the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and this purpose would be frustrated, if not entirely destroyed, if ignorance of the intoxicating quality of the article sold could be interposed as a defense. Ignorance of the law never excuses, and the rule is as absolute that ignorance of the fact never excuses if that be the declaration of the lawmaking body.

The rule announced has been almost universally the one adopted by the courts of the country in the construction of similar statutes. The courts that have adopted a different rule have either been influenced by special statutes, or have, in our opinion, pursued an erroneous course of reasoning. Where ignorance of the fact has been held a good defense, we think too much stress has been given to the rights of the defendant and too little consideration of the rights of society. While it may seem a serious hardship to inflict punishment upon one who has acted innocently, yet the fact remains that the act was of his own volition, generally fruitful of benefits to him and inimical to the rights of the general public. He, then, in our opinion, should suffer, and the general policy of the law prevail. This can be only when the rule is unbending.

The courts holding that the maxim of the criminal law, "Ignorantia facti excusat," applies, seem to be limited to Ohio, North Carolina, and Texas. Farrell v. State, 32 Ohio St. 456, 30 Am. Rep. 614; State v. Powell, 141 N. C. 780, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 477, 53 S. E. 515; Walker v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 495, 98 S. W. 843.

Texas has a general statute providing that "if a person laboring under a mistake as to a particular fact shall do an act which would otherwise be criminal, he is guilty of no offense." Vernon's Anno. Penal Code 1916, art. 46.

And it was held in Patrick v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 587, 78 S. W. 947, that this statute was applicable to all offenses, unless specially excepted. We find no fault with that holding; the language of the statute is broad enough to apply to crimes both malum prohibitum and malum in se. The Texas decisions, however, are relied upon by appellant for a reversal, because he says subdivision 4 of § 24, Penal Code 1913, is like the Texas statute just quoted. Section 24 provides that "all persons are capable of committing crimes except those belonging to the following classes: . . . (4) Persons who committed the act or made the omission charged under an ignorance or mistake of fact which disproves any criminal intent."

This clearly has reference to crimes in which "criminal intent" or guilty knowledge is an essential ingredient. It is manifest by the language itself as also by the whole context of § 24. The other "persons" mentioned in § 24 as incapable of committing crimes are children under fourteen years of age, not knowing the wrongfulness of their acts, and idiots, lunatics, and insane persons, etc.—persons incapable of having or entertaining a criminal intent. Persons of sound mind and unquestioned mental competency, and therefore capable of committing crimes, may, in those cases in which a criminal intent is essential, plead as a defense ignorance or mistake of fact, for the purpose of disproving any criminal intent. They are, for the purposes of their defense, placed in the same category with persons mentally incompetent to form a criminal intent, but, in that class of acts the mere doing of which is made by law the crime, regardless of the purpose or intent, persons of sound mind are not entitled to immunity because of ignorance or mistake of fact. Therefore subdivision 4 can only have reference to those crimes in which a "criminal intent" is necessary. 12 Cyc. 147.

In United States v. Stofello, 8 Ariz. 461, 76 Pac. 611, the defendant was charged with selling intoxicating liquor to an Indian in violation of the laws of Congress. The court held the ignorance of the defendant that the person to whom the sale was made was an Indian was no defense, in this language: "It will be noted that the statute, in plain terms, makes the selling, giving, or disposing of intoxicating liquor to an Indian, a ward of the government, under the charge of an Indian superintendent or agent, a crime. The word 'knowingly' is not used in the act, nor is any word of similar import found therein. An examination of the L.R.A.1916D.

authorities has satisfied us that the offense created by the statute is of that class of crimes in which knowledge or guilty intent is not an essential ingredient, and need not be proven. The doing of the prohibited thing is made an offense, without regard to the purpose or intent. Such crimes are in the nature of police regulations, imposing criminal penalties for their violation, without regard to purpose or intent. The object of such statutes is to require such diligence as will render their violation impossible; the end sought being the protection of the public,"—citing cases.

We have in our statutes many laws for the protection of children; thus it is a crime to sell or give to any minor intoxicating liquor, or to permit a minor under sixteen years of age to enter any saloon or place of entertainment where intoxicating liquors are sold, or to sell, give, or furnish to any minor under eighteen years of age cigars, cigarettes, cigarette paper, smoking or chewing tobacco of any kind or character, or to use vulgar or obscene language in the presence of any child, and, if it be required that guilty knowledge or criminal intent is essential to a conviction under these statutes, it would result in few convictions, and would largely nullify and defeat the purpose of the laws.

Haynes v. State, 118 Tenn. 709, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 559, 121 Am. St. Rep. 1055, 105 S. W. 251, 12 Ann. Cas. 470, is a leading case in which the court discusses both views here contended for, but sustains the proposition that ignorance of fact is no defense in cases of this character. In that case the court said: "It is the sale of intoxicating liquors without license which the statute prohibits, and it is unlawful to sell intoxicating liquor of any character without license. This being so, the seller must find out at his peril whether the liquor he proposes to sell is intoxicating or not. Guilty knowledge is not by the statute made an ingredient of the offense."

In the case and the note thereto (12 Ann. Cas. 471, 472) the cases bearing upon the point show that the great weight of authority sustains the proposition quoted in the decision. We are well satisfied that the court did not err in its refusal to give the instruction requested by appellant, and that it correctly stated the law in the instruction given.

Judgment is accordingly affirmed.

Annotation—Mistake in beverage as defense to charge of illegal sale of liquor.

The earlier cases on this subject are collected in notes to State v. Powell, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 477, and Bacot v. State, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 525.

As to seller's ignorance of minority of purchaser as defense to prosecution for sale of intoxicating liquor to minor, see note to Harper v. State, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 669.

And as to effect on liability under liquor dealer's bond, of his ignorance of purchaser's intoxication or minority, see note to State v. Dubruiel, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 801.

Other notes dealing with the effect of mistake upon criminal responsibility may be found by consulting the Index to L.R.A. Notes, under the title, "Criminal Law," subtitle, "Effect of ignorance, mistake, or belief."

The general rule stated in the earlier notes, to the effect that mistake of fact as to whether liquor sold is intoxicating is no defense to a prosecution for illegal liquor selling, is sustained by the majority of the subsequent cases, including TROUTNER v. STATE, ante, 262.

In Beiser v. State (1913) 9 Ala. App. 72, 63 So. 685, it was decided that it is the fact of a sale of the prohibited articles, and not the intent with which the sale is made, that is denounced by the prohibition law, so that the fact that defendant had bought the liquor which he sold as cider, under a guaranty that it did not have any alcohol in it, would not relieve him of responsibility for the sale if in fact it was whisky; and hence that evidence of this guaranty was properly excluded.

And in Gourley v. Com. (1910) 140 Ky. 221, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 315, 131 S. W. 34, it was said: "In prosecutions for a violation of the antili liquor laws, no question of good faith or good or bad intent is involved. It is the act alone that the law looks at and takes notice of, and by the act the guilt or innocence of the accused is to be judged. If the liquor or beverage is one that will intoxicate, it is wholly immaterial that the accused believed that it would not, or that in good faith he bought it as a nonintoxicant, or that he was ignorant of its quality or ingredients."

Likewise, in People v. Hatinger (1913) 174 Mich. 333, 140 N. W. 648, the court said: "Section 1 of the act prohibits in positive terms the sale of intoxicating liquors, and no language is used which indicates that the element of intent is to be read into it. Had the legislature intended to make the intent to violate the law an essential element, it would have doubtless used some appropriate language indicating its purpose. If it were necessary to prove intent to violate the law before a conviction could be had, the act would fall far short of doing what the legislature obviously intended it should do; and presumably in this can be found the chief reason why it did not incorporate into the act the element of intent. Laws forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquor and impure foods would be of little use if convictions for their violations were to depend on showing guilty knowledge. The fact, then, being that respondent had no knowledge that the cider contained alcohol, and that he purchased it and sold it in good faith, with no intent to violate the law, the law will not avail him in the face of his admission that he sold it and that it contained alcohol." And in connection with this case see People v. Emmons (1913) 178 Mich. 126, 144 N. W. 479, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 425.

But in State v. Coverdale (1910) 1 Boyce (Del.) 555, 77 Atl. 754, a divided court of two, in a prosecution for the illegal sale of vinous liquors, not for medicinal or sacramental purposes, under the local option law (24 Del. Laws, chap. 65), was of the opinion that accused might show in defense any effort made by him to ascertain whether the liquor sold by him was vinous liquor prohibited by law, and that if he had reasonable grounds to believe, and in fact did believe, that such liquor was not vinous, it would be a good defense; but that the burden was upon him to show clearly and satisfactorily that a reasonable and careful man, anxious to obey the law, would have believed under the circumstances that the liquor sold was not vinous, and that defendant did in fact entertain such belief.

In Lightle v. State (1911) 5 Okla. Crim. Rep. 259, 114 Pac. 275, it was held that where one is being prosecuted for having in his possession a substitute for or imitation of beer, with the intention of selling the same, it is no defense that the defendant honestly believed that the substitute contained less than one half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

Where one sells or unlawfully handles any prohibited liquors, in Oklahoma, he does so at his peril, and cannot escape punishment by proving that he was informed and believes that the sale of such liquor is not prohibited in the laws of Oklahoma. (Okla.) Ibid. W. W. A.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,

v.
BOB JOHNSON.

(167 Ky. 727, 181 S. W. 368.)

False pretenses — representations to stranger.

An employee who, having assigned his wages, procures them to be paid to himself by representing to his employer that he has not assigned them, and thereby defrauds the assignee, is guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses.

(January 13, 1916.)

APPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bell County sustaining a demurrer to an indictment charging defendant with unlawfully obtaining money from one person by false pretenses with intent to defraud a third person. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Garnett, Attorney General, D. O. Myatt, Assistant Attorney General, and J. G. Forester for the Commonwealth.

Mr. Jackson Morris for appellee.

Miller, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The grand jury of Bell county returned an indictment charging the appellee with the crime of unlawfully obtaining money from one person by false pretenses, with the intent to perpetrate a fraud upon a third person. Omitting the formal parts, the indictment reads as follows: "The said Bob Johnson, on the 8th day of October, 1914, and before the finding of this indictment, and in the county and state aforesaid, did unlawfully, wilfully, and with the felonious intent to perpetrate a fraud on Bascom Saylor, state, pretend, and represent to Knabb & Shank Company that he had not given an order or transferred to another person the amount said company owed him for work, and did collect from said company $10 and other sums of money, when at the time he knew he had sold said time and the money due therefor to Bascom Saylor, and received from said Saylor the pay therefor, and said statements were false, and said Knabb & Shank Company relied on said statements and paid him said money, which it would not have done otherwise. Said statements were made with the intent to defraud said Bascom Saylor, which was done by said false statements."

This indictment was found under § 1208 of the Kentucky Statutes, which provides, in part, as follows: "If any person by any false pretense, statement, or token, with intention to commit a fraud, obtain from another money, property, or other thing which may be the subject of larceny, . . . he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years."

The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the indictment, and the commonwealth appeals.

It will be observed that the indictment charges appellee with having made the false statement to his employer, the Knabb & Shank Company, with the intent to defraud Bascom Saylor, to whom appellee had assigned his wages, and that the Knabb & Shank Company relied on said false statement and paid Johnson his wages, which operated as a fraud upon Saylor.

The appellee contends that the indictment is defective because it fails to charge that he made a false statement to Saylor, the prosecutor in this case, and that it is insufficient to charge appellee with the crime denounced by the statute, by alleging that the false representation was made to the Knabb & Shank Company, which has not been defrauded in any way. In other words, appellee insists that the false representation must be made to the party defrauded, and that he must have relied upon it to his injury; that it is no offense if the representation is made to one person and the money is obtained from a different person. The Knabb & Shank Company having paid the money to Johnson without notice of the assignment to Saylor, that company has in no way been prejudiced. The payment was a valid one so far as the company was concerned. So the case reduces itself to this proposition: Is it a crime under the statute when a false representation is made to one, and money or property is thereby obtained from another? An examination of the question shows it has often been decided.

In Com v. Call, 21 Pick. 515, 32 Am. Dec. 284, decided in 1839, the defendant was indicted under the Massachusetts statute for obtaining money on false pretenses, under the following circumstances: Parker owed White and Sargent $11.63, and Call falsely pretended and represented himself to Parker as being the authorized collector of White and Sargeant, and that they had sent him to collect and receive the money due them from Parker, and that Parker, believing the false representation, paid Call the $11.63 which he owed to White and Sargeant. The indictment charged Call with having defrauded White and Sargent of their money by means of the fraudulent representation to Parker. The Massachusetts statute under which the indictment was found provided, like ours, that if any person should designedly, by any false pretense, and with intent to defraud, obtain from another person any money, goods, wares, merchandise, or other property, he should be punished, etc. In affirming a conviction the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts said: "The objection to the indictment is that it alleges an intent to defraud one person, and that false pretenses were practised upon another; that one man was deceived and his money obtained, and another defrauded. The facts reported clearly show that these allegations are the only ones which would meet the proof, and that, if this indictment cannot be sustained, a gross fraud may be practised within the words of the statute, and yet not be liable to punishment under it. A combination of facts has here occurred, and may occur again, where a deception has been practised upon one person and his property obtained, and the loss has fallen upon another, the intention being to defraud him. This is clearly within the mischief intended to be guarded against, and we have no doubt within the effective prohibition of the statute."

Again, in State v. Scott, 48 Mo. 422, decided in 1871, Scott was indicted under the statute for falsely pretending to Conn that Scott's check on a New York bank for $150 was a good, genuine, and available order for the payment of $150, and that Scott kept an account with said bank and he had money therein for the payment of the check; that Conn thereupon indorsed the check, and that said indorsement was procured by Scott with the intent to cheat and defraud. The Missouri statute upon the subject provided that "every person who, with intent to cheat or defraud another, shall designedly, by color of any false token or writing, or by any other false pretense, obtain the signature of any person to any written instrument, . . . shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished in the same manner and to the same extent as for feloniously stealing the

In sustaining the conviction the supreme court of Missouri said: "It was not necessary to allege in the indictment that the defendant used the false pretenses or obtained the signature of Conn with the specific intention of cheating or defrauding any particular person or body. The statute has enacted a rule at war with any such assumption. It declares that it shall be sufficient, in any indictment for an offense, where an intent to injure, cheat, or defraud shall be necessary to constitute the offense, to allege that the defendant did the act with such intent without alleging the intent of the defendant to be to injure, cheat, or defraud any particular person, and on the trial of such offense it shall not be necessary to prove an intent on the part of the defendant to injure, cheat, or defraud any particular person, but it shall be sufficient to prove that the defendant did the act charged with an intent to injure, cheat, and defraud."

In Mack v. State, 63 Ala. 138, decided in 1879, John Mack was indicted under § 4370 of the Alabama Code of 1876, which declared that "any person who, by any false pretense or token, and with the intent to injure or defraud, obtains from another any money or other personal property, must, on conviction, be punished as if he had stolen it."

The pretense charged against John Mack was that he falsely pretended to Smith that he had been sent by Ella Mack for certain musical instruments then in the possession of Smith, but held by him for said Ella, and that under this pretense John Mack obtained possession of the instruments, thereby defrauding Ella Mack. It will be noticed that the false representation was made to Smith, but to the prejudice of Ella Mack. In sustaining the conviction under these facts, the supreme court of Alabama said: "To constitute this statutory crime, there must be a pretense, by declaration or otherwise, that some fact or facts exist tending to induce another to part with something valuable, and upon the strength of which pretense or representation the possession of the valuable thing is parted with. The accomplished fraud must have reasonable connection with the pretense (Bishop Statutory Crimes, § 452), and the pretense must be shown to be false, and made with intent to injure or defraud. Defraud whom? The statute does not in terms inform us. Usually the intent is to defraud the owner of the thing obtained; but it is sufficient if the intent be to defraud anyone connected with the ownership, possession, or custody of the chattel."

In State v. Hargrave, 103 N. C. 328, 9 S. E. 46, decided in 1889, Hargrave assigned his claim for witness fees against the county to Clodfelter in exchange for goods. Clodfelter filed the assignment with Kinney, the county officer authorized to pay the claim; but, the assignment having been mislaid, Hargrave collected his witness-fees, thereby defrauding Clodfelter. The indictment charged Hargrave with having defrauded Clodfelter by falsely pretending to Kinney that he was the owner and entitled to the money due upon his witness claim, and that he thereby obtained the money from Kinney and defrauded Clodfelter. The trial court instructed the jury that if it believed beyond a reasonable doubt, that Hargrave fraudulently, designedly, knowingly, and falsely represented to Kinney that he had not assigned his claim to Clodfelter, and that he was the owner of the order, when in truth and in fact, he was not, and that by reason thereof he obtained the money from Kinney, he was guilty. Upon appeal the supreme court of North Carolina approved this instruction, holding that the making of a false representation to one person so as to defraud another constituted an indictable offense, under the statute. To the same effect, see Bishop's New Crim. Proc. 2d Ed. vol. 3, § 174.

In Schayer v. People, 5 Colo. App. 75, 37 Pac. 43, decided in 1894, the Colorado statute provided that "if any person shall cause or procure others to report falsely of his honesty, wealth, or mercantile character, and by thus imposing on any person or persons, obtain credit, and thereby fraudulently get into possession of goods, wares, merchandise, or any valuable thing, every such offender shall be deemed a swindler, and on conviction" shall be punished, etc. Gen. Stat. 1883, § 884.

Under this statute Schayer was convicted of fraudulently obtaining possession of goods of Bockfinger by means of a false report of his wealth and mercantile character which he caused to be made to Bockfinger by the mercantile agency of R. G. Dun & Company. The court reversed a judgment convicting Schayer because of variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof, but in doing so it construed the statute as follows: "To constitute the offense defined by the statute, it is not necessary that an intention to defraud any particular person or persons should exist. If the false report which has been procured results in defrauding any person of his property, the offense is complete whether the offender had such person in his mind or not; and an indictment setting forth that the person charged caused others to report falsely of his honesty, wealth, or mercantile character, and that by means of the report some person or persons, naming them, were imposed upon so that they extended credit to L.R.A.1916D.

the offender, and he thereby fraudulently obtained possession of their property, would contain substantially all the facts necessary to constitute the offense under the statute."

And in State v. Bourne, 86 Minn. 432, 90 S. W. 1108, decided in 1902, it was held that, where an indictment for larceny for obtaining money through false pretenses charged that the intent was to defraud a particular person, it was not a variance if the proof showed that some other person than the one specified in the indictment was defrauded.

In 19 Cyc. 415, the rule deduced from the authorities is stated as follows: "The intent to defraud need not be directed against the legal owner; it is sufficient if it be directed against anyone in lawful possession of the goods, or who parts with property in reliance thereon. Nor need the intent be to cause ultimate loss to prosecutor, since prosecutor is defrauded by the mere obtaining of his property by a false pretense; although he may suffer an ultimate loss, an intent to cause actual loss is not necessary."

We have not overlooked the case of Moulton v. State, 5 Lea, 577, which seems to be at variance with the otherwise uniform line of authorities above cited. The opinion in the Moulton Case, however, is not more than two pages in length, and does not attempt to argue the question, and does not refer to any of the cases above cited.

It will be observed that our statute is very broad in its terms; it does not require that the false statement or representation must be made to the party defrauded. On the contrary, it says, if any person by any false pretense or statement, with the intention to commit a fraud, obtain money, he is guilty. The statute does not require that the false statement should be made to any particular person or that it should be with the intention of committing a fraud upon the person to whom the false statement was made. The offense is committed when the false statement is made with the intention to commit a fraud, and money or property is thereby obtained.

The indictment need not charge that the person to whom the false pretense was made sustained any loss. Com. v. Ferguson, 135 Ky. 34, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1101, 121 S. W. 967, 21 Ann. Cas. 434.

The purpose of the statute is to punish the perpetrators of fraud committed through any false pretense. The gist of the offense is the successful misrepresentation, regardless of the person to whom it was made. 19 Cyc. 404. The indictment satisfies this construction of the statute.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the indictment, and for further proceedings.

Annotation—False pretenses: necessity of making the false pretenses to the defrauded party or of intending to defraud a particular person.

The question whether actual deception of the person from whom money or property is obtained is essential to the offense of obtaining the same by false pretenses, where such person is not the owner, but an agent or officer of the owner, of the property, is discussed in the note to State v. Talley, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 938.

As to whether an indictment or information for obtaining money under false pretenses may lay ownership in one who was in possession of the property as agent, bailee, etc., see the note to Martins v. State (1908) 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 645.

The cases generally in this note under the statutes, involved support COM. v. JOHNSON, ante, 267, in holding that it is not necessary that the false representations be made to the person defrauded in order to convict one of obtaining money or property by false pretenses.

It was held in State v. Hargrave (1889) 103 N. C. 328, 9 S. E. 406, that a charge that defendant obtained something of value from one person by making a false representation to him with intent to defraud a third person not connected as agent was clearly within the mischief intended to be remedied by the statute.

So, in Com. v. Call (1839) 21 Pick. (Mass.) 515, 32 Am. Dec. 284, discussed in COM. v. JOHNSON, an indictment under statute for obtaining money by false pretenses, averring that the pretenses were practised upon one person and his money obtained with intent to defraud another, was held good. This indictment, observed the court, would manifestly be bad at common law, because the obtaining of property by false pretenses is not an offense punishable at common law. But even had false tokens, one of the means of deception mentioned in this statute, been used, it is contended that the indictment would still be defective by the rules of the common law, because the allegation that one was deceived, and another defrauded, is repugnant, absurd, and suicidal. And the case of Rex v. Lara, subsequently set out in this note, is relied upon as deciding this point. That case, which certainly seems to be directly in point, was an Old Bailey trial, in which, according to the report, the decision appears to have been made by the jury rather than the bench. At most, it was a hasty ruling during a criminal trial, in a tribunal more remarkable for its promptitude than its deliberation in such trials; it never received a revision, and is not entitled to much respect.

So, it is held in Reg. v. Brown (1847) 2 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 348, that under Stat. 7 & 8 Geo. IV. chap. 29, § 53, the pretense need not be made to the person from whom the money is obtained; the mode in which the pretense to A effects an obtaining of money from B being matter of evidence. See also Reg. v. Moseley (1861) Leigh & C. C. C. (Eng.) 92, 9 Cox, C. C. 16.

And see Schayer v. People (1894) 5 Colo. App. 75, 37 Pac. 43, as set out in the opinion of COM. v. JOHNSON.

Representation to agent or officer.

A false representation to an agent or clerk has been held a false pretense to the principal. Com. v. Call (1839) 21 Pick. (Mass.) 515, 32 Am. Dec. 284 (agent); Com. v. Harley (1844) 7 Met. (Mass.) 462 (representations made to clerk who communicates them to one of firm); People v. Cadot (1903) 138 Cal. 527, 71 Pac. 649 (false pretenses to agent); People v. Wakely (1886) 62 Mich. 297, 28 N. W. 871 (it is competent to allege in an information for false pretenses that the false representations were made to an agent, and if he had authority to sell the article obtained by such false pretense, the information will be sufficient although the principal did not act upon the representations made otherwise than through the agent); State v. Taylor (1902) 131 N. C. 711, 42 S. E. 539 (it is not necessary that the pretense be made to the principal, but if made to an agent, by means of which the property of the principal is obtained, it is sufficient); People v. Eaton (1907) 122 App. Div. 706, 107 N. Y. Supp. 849 (a representation to an agent of a corporation to obtain money from the corporation is a representation to the corporation). See also State v. Turley (1898) 142 Mo. 403, 44 S. W. 267.

So, representations made to an officer acting in behalf of a county will support a conviction of obtaining money or property from the county by false pretenses. Roberts v. People (1886) 9 Colo. 458, 13 Pac. 630 (presenting false accounts to board of county commissioners); State v. Lynn (1901) 3 Penn. (Del.) 316, 51 Atl. 878 (presentation of false bill for labor and services).

In an indictment for obtaining money from a city by false pretenses by the presentation of a false bill for labor and material, an allegation that the accused pretended and falsely represented to the mayor is sufficient without its averring the channels or route (intermediate agents) by which the representations reached him. People ex rel. Phelps v. Oyer & Terminer Ct. (1881) 83 N. Y. 436. See also State v. Stewart (1900) 9 N. D. 409, 83 N. W. 869, where money was obtained from the county by presenting the auditor a false certificate of claim for bounty.)

An indictment charging the obtaining of money from the board of chosen freeholders by certain false pretenses made to the county collector is sufficient, it not being necessary that the pretenses be made to the person from whom the money was obtained. State v. Crowley (1877) 39 N. J. L. 264.

So, where an indictment for swindling charged that accused secured a loan from one's agent upon a mortgage on property which accused did not own, it was held in Perry v. State (1898) 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 495, 46 S. W. 816, that there was no variance, although the mortgage and note set out in the indictment were executed to the principal, the evidence showing that the principal had nothing to do with the transaction except through his agent.

Where one was indicted under the act of 1815, chap. 143, for obtaining goods by false pretenses from a mercantile firm, pretenses proved to have been made to one partner were, in Com. v. Moorar (1834) Thacher Crim. Cas. (Mass.) 410, held to sustain the indictment. See also to the same effect. Reg. v. Kealey (1851) 1 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 585, 2 Den. C. C. 69, Temple & M. 405, 15 Jur. 230, 5 Cox, C. C. 193.

Advertisement.

It has been held that one may obtain goods or property from another under false pretenses by means of an advertisement to the general public.

Thus, where one obtained a check from a person by means of a fraudulent newspaper advertisement for a housemaid, it was held in Reg. v. Silverlock [1894] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 766, 63 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 233, 10 Reports, 431, 72 L. T. N. S. 298, 43 Week. Rep. 14, 18 Cox, C. C. 104, 58 J. P. 788, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 276, 10 Am. Crim. Rep. 318, that the indictment was good, although it did not allege that the pretense was made to a particular person.

See also Reg. v. Randell (1887) 57 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 718, 52 J. P. 359, 16 Cox, C. C. 335, where one was held guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses where he induced persons to pay money for the privilege of competing in a word contest for prizes, the advertisement containing a false statement of facts.

Intent.

It is generally held unnecessary under statutes for obtaining money or property by false pretenses, to allege in the indictment the intent of the accused to cheat, injure, or defraud any particular person (State v. Hazen (1897) 104 Iowa, 16, 73 N. W. 359; State v. Scott (1871) 48 Mo. 422), and in some jurisdictions the statute expressly provides that it shall be sufficient to allege that accused did the act with intent to defraud, without alleging the intent to defraud any particular person (State v. Blizzard (1889) 70 Md. 385, 14 Am. St. Rep. 366, 17 Atl. 270; State v. Dixon (1888) 101 N. C. 741, 7 S. E. 870; State v. Ridge (1899) 125 N. C. 658, 34 S. E. 440; State v. Salisbury Ice & Fuel Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 366, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216, 81 S. E. 737).

So, it has been held that an intent to defraud need not be directed against the legal owner; it is sufficient if it is directed against anyone in lawful possession of the goods, or anyone who parts with property in reliance thereon. Mack v. State (1879) 63 Ala. 138.

In Reg. v. Parkinson (1876) 41 U. C. Q. B. 545, one was held guilty of obtaining money from an accountant by false pretenses although the money belonged to another person and there was no sufficient proof of an intent to defraud that person.

A conviction for obtaining money by false pretenses cannot be arrested because the indictment charged intent to defraud a fictitious person, while the evidence shows that the real person was not known in the transaction, where the statute provides that it shall be sufficient to charge intent to defraud without alleging an intent to defraud any particular person. State v. Salisbury Ice & Fuel Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 366, 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216, 81 S. E. 737.

It was held in State v. Hartnett (1909) 7 Penn. (Del.) 204, 74 Atl. 82, however, that in order to find one guilty of an attempt to obtain money under false pretenses from the county treasurer by presenting a false bill to the levy court, it was necessary to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant intended to defraud the named county treasurer.

An indictment for fraud at common law, charging the false pretense to have been made to one person and the deceit to have been practised on a different person, is, in Rex v. Lara (1794) 2 Leach, C. L. (Eng.) 647, 2 East, P. C. 819, 6 T. R. 565, held bad. See, however, Com. v. Call (1839) 21 Pick. (Mass.) 515, 32 Am. Dec. 284.

So, an indictment alleging the employment of men to mine coal by the ton, and the use of false weights, sets out the first and second element necessary to constitute a cheat at common law, but is fatally defective in failing specifically to charge that any person was defrauded. Com. v. Steen (1896) 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 624.

In Com. v. Harley (1844) 7 Met. (Mass.) 506, it was held that a charge in an indictment at common law for conspiracy to defraud a particular individual was not supported by evidence of a conspiracy to cheat the public generally, although it did in fact operate to defraud the individual named; and that the variance between the allegations and the proof was fatal to the prosecution. See also to the same effect Com. v. Kellogg (1851) 7 Cush. (Mass.) 473.

It was held in State v. Bourne (1902) 86 Minn. 432, 90 N. W. 1108, that where in an indictment for larceny for obtaining money or property through false pretenses, it is charged that the intent is to defraud a particular person, it is not a variance if the proofs tend to show that some other person or corporation than the one specified in such criminal pleading was defrauded. In this case a deputy auditor forged orders on the county treasurer and sold them to a bank as genuine, and these orders, when innocently presented by the bank for payment, were paid by the county treasurer. It was contended that defendant's intent to defraud was to be tested by the actual result of his criminal acts, since he could premeditate only the natural consequence that followed; and when the treasurer innocently paid to the innocent purchaser of these forged orders their apparent face value, it conclusively established an intent to defraud the county rather than the bank, which it was urged was a fatal variance between the indictment and the proofs. The court observed, however, that it was not easy, upon the application of the rules of the common law or of common sense, to discover any legal force to this claim. J. D. C.

v.

ALBERT E. PARISH, as County Assessor of King County, Respt.

(— Wash. —, 154 Pac. 785.)

Tax — exemption — special law —
Young Men's Christian Association.

An exemption from taxation of property of a Young Men's Christian Association, used for the religious purposes of the association, is not within constitutional authority to exempt property by general laws, where the property of other organizations devoted to religious purposes is left subject to taxation.

For other cases, see Taxes, I. f, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(February 5, 1916.)

dismissing an action brought to restrain defendant from listing for taxation certain real property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George H. Walker and Fletcher Lewis, for appellant:

The exemption statute is constitutional.

State v. Vance, 29 Wash. 435, 70 Pac. 34; State v. Sharpless, 31 Wash. 191, 96 Am. St. Rep. 893, 71 Pac. 737; Leicht v. Burlington, 73 Iowa, 29, 34 N. W. 494; *State ex rel. Van Riper v. The entire property of the Young Men's Christian Association as described in the complaint is wholly used for the religious purposes of the association within the meaning of the statute.

Messrs. Samuel Morrison and John F. Murphy, for respondent:

The exemption statute in question is unconstitutional.

Even if this court should find that the statute exempting the Young Men's Christian Association is constitutional, nevertheless no part of plaintiff's property was used for the religious purposes of the association within the meaning of the statute, with the possible exception of the auditorium.

Main, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought for the purpose of restraining the county assessor of King county from listing for taxation certain real property. The trial resulted in a judgment dismissing the action. From this judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

The appellant, at the time the action was instituted, was the owner of lots 2 and 3 and the east half of lots 6 and 7, in block 21, of Boren's addition to the city of Seattle. This property fronted on the west side of Fourth avenue in the city of Seattle, and extended from Madison street to Marion street. The appellant had for some years owned lots 2 and 3, and had erected thereon a six-story brick and concrete building, which is known as the Y. M. C. A. building. After this building had been erected, the association acquired two adjacent half lots on the south, facing Fourth avenue and extending from the main building to Marion street. This latter property was, when acquired, and still is, improved by the east half of the former Stander Hotel, a six-story brick and stone structure. Since its purchase by the association, it has been connected with the main building as an annex thereof, and is permanently partitioned off from the unacquired part of the Stander hotel. The entire property thus owned by the association is used for the various activities and departments of the Young Men's Christian Association.

The objects of the association as set forth in its articles of incorporation, are: "The improvement of the spiritual, mental, social, and physical condition of the young men of Seattle by the support and maintenance of lectures, gospel services, libraries, reading rooms, gymnasiums, recreation grounds, etc. . . ."

The county assessor of King county was asserting the right to list this property for purposes of taxation upon the tax rolls for the year 1913, when the present action was brought for the purpose of restraining such listing.

The controlling question in the case is whether the statute under which it is claimed the property is exempt from taxation is constitutional or unconstitutional.

The statute, Rem. & Bal. Code. § 9098, as amended by chapter 117 of the Session Laws of 1913, relating to taxation, after exempting certain other specified property, provides: "Also, all property of Young Men's Christian Associations . . . which shall be wholly used, or to the extent solely used, for the religious purposes of such associations."

It will be noted that this is an exemption to the association by name, with a limitation that only such of its property as is "wholly used," or to the extent "solely used," for the religious purposes of such association, shall be exempt.

Section 2 of article 7 of the state Constitution, after requiring that the legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation upon all property in the state, and prescribing such regulations by general law as shall secure a just valuation for the taxation of all the property, provides: "That the property of the United States, and of the state, counties, school districts, and other municipal corporations, and such other property as the legislature may by general laws provide, shall be exempt from taxation."

Under this section of the Constitution, all property within the state is subject to taxation, unless it falls within one of the classes mentioned in the Constitution and is exempted therefrom by a general law. The question then arises: Is the statute by which the property of Young Men's Christian Associations is claimed to be exempt a general or a special law? If it is a special law, obviously the attempted exemption is invalid under the constitutional provision quoted. If it is a general law, then it conforms to the constitutional requirement.

The authorities are in substantial harmony upon the rule by which a law is to be tested to determine whether it is general or special. A "special law" is one which relates to particular persons or things, while a "general law" is one which applies to all persons or things of a class. A law is general when it operates upon all persons or things constituting a class, even though such class consists of but one person or thing; but the law must be so framed that all persons or things constituting the class come within its provisions. 4 Words & Phrases, 2d Series, p. 635; Budd ex rel. State Commissioner v. Hancock, 66 N. J. L. 133, 48 Atl. 1023; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Miller, 100 Mo. 439, 13 S. W. 677; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 121.

In Words & Phrases, supra, the rule is stated: "A special law is one that relates to particular persons or things of a class, as distinguished from a general law, which applies to all persons or things of a class."

The rule is stated in Budd v. Hancock, supra, as follows: "A law is special in a constitutional sense when, by force of an inherent limitation, it arbitrarily separates some persons, places, or things from others upon which, but for such limitation, it would operate. The test of a special law is the appropriateness of its provisions to the objects that it excludes. It is not, therefore, what a law includes that makes it special, but what it excludes. If nothing be excluded that should be contained, the law is general. Within this distinction between a special and a general law, the question in every case is whether any appropriate object is excluded to which the law, but for its limitations, would apply. If the only limitation contained in a law is a legitimate classification of its objects, it is a general law. Hence, if the object of a law have characteristics so distinct as reasonably to form, for the purpose legislated upon, a class by itself, the law is general, notwithstanding it operates upon a single object only; for a law is not general because it operates upon every person in the state, but because every person that can be brought within its predicament becomes subject to its operation."

Many other authorities could be cited supporting the rule; but as the controversy upon this phase of the case is over the application of the law, rather than its statement, further citation in support of the rule seems unnecessary.

In applying the rule, this court in Denver v. Spokane Falls, 7 Wash. 226, 34 Pac. 926, held that an act of the legislature which attempted to confer upon certain municipal corporations which had previously undertaken to incorporate under an invalid law, the right to incorporate under the statute without reference to the population, but solely by reason of their peculiar condition, was a special, and not a general, law. It was there said: "As to such communities, is this a general or a special law? It is claimed by the learned counsel for the appellants that it is general, because it applies to all communities in the state similarly situated. But we think that cannot be said to be the exclusive test. If the operation and effect of a statute is necessarily limited to a particular class or number of persons or things, it is as much a special statute, whatever may be its form, as it would be if it applied to but one person or thing only."

In Terry v. King County, 43 Wash. 61, 86 Pac. 210, 9 Ann. Cas. 1170, the court had under consideration a statute which specifically conferred upon King, Pierce, and Spokane counties and the cities of Seattle, Tacoma, and Spokane, power to contract indebtedness for the purpose of purchasing armory sites and assisting in the construction of armories. No other counties or towns in the state were mentioned in the act. Nor was it possible for any other county, even though its population should equal that of the counties named, to come within its provisions. It was there held that the law was special, and not general, citing the previous case of Denver v. Spokane Falls, supra.

Applying the rule of law stated and its application as appears in the two cases last cited, to the facts in the present case, was the statute exempting the Young Men's Christian Association general or special? The exemption covers the property of such associations wholly used, or to the extent solely used, for religious purposes of the association. If the property should not be devoted to a religious purpose, then it does not come within the exemption. The effect of the statute is to exempt only the property of Young Men's Christian Associations which is devoted to religious purposes. Under this statute, other property in the state devoted to religious purposes would not be exempt. The property of the class referred to in the statute is that devoted to religious purposes. The association is one organization which devotes property to such purposes. The property of other associations devoted to a religious purpose could not claim the exemption. The statute is special, and not general, because it excludes from its operation the property of other organizations which is or may be devoted or set apart for religious purposes.

It would hardly be claimed that a statute exempting the church property of a particular religious denomination by name, and which thus would exclude from its provisions the church property of all other denominations, would be a general law. Likewise a statute which exempts property of Young Men's Christian Associations only to the extent such property is devoted to religious purposes, as already stated, must necessarily exclude the property of other organizations and associations devoting property to the same purposes. The operation and effect of the statute are limited to one of the organizations which compose a class, and is therefore special. The case falls within the holdings of this court in the cases of Denver v. Spokane Falls, and Terry v. King County, supra.

A number of cases are cited in the briefs where the property of Young Men's Christian Associations has been held exempt. In every one of the cases cited, with one exception, the exemptions were under statutes which did not exempt the property of the associations by name, but exempted all property by general language which was devoted to religious, benevolent, or charitable purposes. Had the statute in this state under which this case arose contained some such general language, an entirely different question would be presented. The one case referred to as supporting an exemption where the statute applied to a Young Men's Christian Association by name was that of Y. M. C. A. v. Keene, 70 N. H. 223, 46 Atl. 186. In the state of New Hampshire, however, where that case was decided, there was no constitutional provision against the passage of a special law.

In reaching the conclusion that the statutory provision is unconstitutional, we have not overlooked the rule adopted by the previous decisions of this court that a law will be presumed constitutional and valid until the contrary clearly appears, and that it is the duty of the court to sustain the law unless its invalidity is so apparent as to leave no reasonable doubt upon the question. State v. Somerville, 67 Wash. 638, 122 Pac. 324; State v. Pitney, 79 Wash. 608, 140 Pac. 918, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 209. Notwithstanding this rule, we see no escape from the conclusion that the statute containing the exemption is special, and therefore, under the Constitution, is invalid.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Annotation—Exemption from property taxation of property of Young Men's Christian Association or Young Women's Christian Association.

As suggested by the title, the purpose of this note is the practical one of bringing together the cases which have passed specifically on the exemption from property taxation of property of the Young Men's Christian Association or the Young Women's Christian Association. The scope of the note, of course, precludes any investigation of the legal questions involved except so far as they have been presented in cases dealing with property of one or the other of these associations. Some of these questions have been treated in other notes. L.R.A.1916D.

Generally, as to effect of fact that property otherwise exempt from taxation is devoted to purposes of a particular society, see notes to Widows & Orphans' Home v. Com. 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 829, and Re Wilson, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 697.

As to right of charitable, educational, or religious institutions to exemption from taxation as affected by the geographical field of operation, see notes to

Carter v. Whitecomb, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 733, and Re Assessment of Collateral Inheritance Tax, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 817.

It may be observed that no case involving a Young Men's Christian Association or Young Women's Christian Association has been found precisely in point with Y. M. C. A. v. PARISH, ante, 272, where the controlling question is whether the statute under which exemption is claimed is constitutional or unconstitutional as being general or special.

A Young Men's Christian Association organized to seek out young men and endeavor to bring them under moral and religious influences is, in Com. v. Y. M. C. A. (1903) 116 Ky. 711, 105 Am. St. Rep. 234, 76 S. W. 522, held to come within a statute exempting from taxation places used for religious worship and institutions of purely public charity, the association conducting religious services every Sunday afternoon, with the singing of hymns and expounding of the Scriptures, there being merely a nominal fee exacted for membership, the members having no property rights and receiving no profits or dividends, and the certificates of membership being not transferable and having no money value.

Speaking of the exemption claimed for the property of a Young Men's Christian Association, the charter of which announces as the corporate purpose the improvement of the spiritual, social and intellectual condition of the young men of the city, and declares that, in consideration of the proposed work of establishing a public library, the property of the association shall be free from taxation, the court in State ex rel. Cunningham v. Board of Assessors (1899) 52 La. Ann. 223, 26 So. 872, said: "It is claimed that the association having established a library, that the legislative act constitutes a contract entitling the association to exemption. The Constitution of 1868, under which this charter was obtained, requiring all property to be taxed, gave the legislature power to exempt property actually used for church, school, or charitable purposes, and the real and personal estates of any library. It is claimed that the building owned by the association is exempt because it is to be deemed used for charitable purposes. The argument is that caring for the social, moral, and spiritual condition of men is charity in the broadest sense, and that a place provided by the association where young men can assemble for religious exercises, and be secluded from temptation, is a charity and a blessing. We wish we could yield L.R.A 1916D.

to this reasoning. It demonstrates the capacity of the association to aid in the intellectual improvement of young men, and the usefulness of the association in promoting religious purposes. But in our opinion the argument fails to bring the association and its rooms within the exemption granted in the Constitution to property actually used for charitable purposes. We are dealing with a question of exemption under the imperative rule so often affirmed, of strict construction. If the property of the association is to be exempt because of the tendency of the association to advance the intellectual and moral condition of young men, it would be the beginning of a latitudinous construction that far exceeds the bounds the Constitution imposes. The Constitution of 1879, like that of 1868, exempts 'the real and personal estates of public libraries.' We gather from the record the association has established such a library. To the extent the building is used for that purpose, in our opinion, the property is exempt from taxation."

A Young Men's Christian Association, the purpose of which is "the improvement of the spiritual, mental, social, and physical condition of young men," is in Little v. Newburyport (1912) 210 Mass. 414, 96 N. E. 1032, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 425, held a benevolent or charitable institution within the meaning of a statute exempting from taxation institutions of that character. It is stated that this association carries on a work which is intended and adapted for the improvement and elevation of young men, not only to bring them under good influences, but to promote their moral, mental, and physical welfare. It incurs expenses for this purpose, for which it relies mainly upon charitable contributions. In its essence, though not giving charity in the narrow sense of that meaning, it is a benevolent or charitable institution within the meaning of those words in the statute; and the facts that some of its benefits are afforded only to its members, and that the privileges of becoming active members, of voting and of holding offices, are limited, are not material. This same case holds that a fund bequeathed to trustees for the purpose of paying the net income thereof to this institution, for the general purposes of the association, is exempt from taxation under the statute.

The buildings of the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Paterson, however, are held, in Trustees of the Y. M. C. A. v. Paterson (1898) 61

N. J. L. 420, 39 Atl. 655, affirmed without opinion in (1900) 64 N. J. L. 361, 45 Atl. 1092, not used exclusively for charitable purposes within the meaning of a general act exempting buildings so used from taxation. The court stated that in all statutes exempting private property from taxation, words descriptive of the property must receive the narrowest interpretation of which they are reasonably capable. So interpreted, charitable purposes are eleemosynary purposes,—purposes connected with the distribution of charity, namely, of aid to the needy. It is impossible to hold that these buildings are in this sense used exclusively for charitable purposes. With slight exceptions those who use them are not the recipients of charity, but such as purchase the right to use them at a price deemed adequate. For these exceptions the contributions may compensate the association, and to this extent the buildings are used for charitable purposes; but this is too small in proportion to the aggregate to give character to the whole so as to justify a statement that the purposes are exclusively charitable.

So, the property of a Young Men's Christian Association was, in New York Y. M. C. A. v. New York (1889) 113 N. Y. 187, 21 N. E. 86, reversing (1887) 44 Hun, 102, held not to be exclusively used for the purposes of public worship, or exclusively used for those of a seminary of learning, so as to exempt it from taxation under a general act; the objects of the association as described in its charter are the improvement of the spiritual, mental, and social condition of young men in the city of New York; the means to be employed are sermons, libraries, reading rooms, social meetings, and other necessary incidents, among which are lectures, concerts, and entertainments, bath room and gymnasium, and instructions in penmanship, arithmetic, book-keeping, and drawing; the building contains above the basement, in which are the gymnasium, bowling alley, and bath room, twenty-two rooms, one only of which is devoted to purposes of public worship, and that not exclusively, since it is also used as a lecture hall.

The following cases, involving property of Young Men's Christian Associations, may be found in the note to Com. v. Lynchburg Y. M. C. A. 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1197, which discusses the effect of using property of religious, charitable, or educational institution in secular business or for revenue, upon its right to exemption from taxation: People ex rel. L.R.A. 1916D.

Gore v. Y. M. C. A. (1898) 157 Ill. 403, 41 N. E. 557 (property of Y. M. C. A. leased for profit not exempt); Auburn v. Y. M. C. A. (1894) 86 Me. 244, 29 Atl. 992 (same); Y. M. C. A. v. Keene (1900) 70 N. H. 223, 46 Atl. 186 (property taxable where part of building is let for purpose of profit or gain, the same not being used for purposes of association within the meaning of exempting statute); Y. M. C. A. v. Douglas County (1900) 60 Neb. 642, 52 L.R.A. 123, 83 N. W. 924 (property not exempt when partially used for business purposes); Com. v. Y. M. C. A. (1914) 115 Va. 745, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1197, 80 S. E. 589 (dormitories for the use of which fee is charged, not taxable).

And the following cases may be added to the note above mentioned: State ex rel. Koeln v. St. Louis Y. M. C. A. (1914) 259 Mo. 233, 168 S. W. 589 (buildings not exempt when part rented for commercial purposes); Ottawa Y. M. C. A. v. Ottawa (1913) 29 Ont. L. Rep. 574, 5 Ont. Week. N. 383, 15 D. L. R. 718, affirming (1910) 20 Ont. L. Rep. 567 (portion of building in which meals are served and bedrooms let to members is not subject to taxation).

Where a Young Men's Christian Association wished to erect a new building on a new site, but, because of a business depression, could not sell the old site, and a director, with a view of assisting the association, purchased a lease of the old site with an option to purchase, it was held in Louisville v. Y. M. C. A. (1915) — Ky. —, 178 S. W. 1168, that the transaction was not a subterfuge to escape taxation, that it did not amount to a conveyance of the property, and that the property could not be taxed, since it remained in the hands of the association, which was purely a public charity, the option and lease, however, being taxable.

Vacant lots owned by the Young Women's Christian Association, purchased with money provided and to be used for acquiring a site and erecting thereon a building suitable for the purposes of the organization, are in Y. W. C. A. v. Spencer (1907) 29 Ohio C. C. 249, held not within the meaning of a statute which provides that all buildings belonging to and lands actually occupied by charitable institutions shall be exempt from taxation.

The Christian Women's Exchange, established to assist poor women, is in State ex rel. Cunningham v. Board of Assessors (1899) 52 La. Ann. 223, 26 So. 872, said to come within a statute exempting from taxation all charitable institutions provided the property is not used or leased for purposes of private or corporate profit or income. The court said that this institution furnishes meals to the indigent, receiving a moderate price from those who can pay, and that the price of the meals is adjusted with no view to profit, but to provide for the expense of the meals, which are prepared by the orphans the institution feeds. The institution provides a free library for those it is designed to aid, receives and sells articles made by the poor women, to whom the proceeds accrue, with the deduction of a small amount to defray the expenses of sale. Beside this the institution provides rooms free of charge to the necessary employees, and to the young and unprotected females it affords a home at charges proportioned to actual expenses. The institution owns its building donated for the purpose, and it is used exclusively for that purpose. There is no leasing or use of the building for revenue, nor element of profit connected with it. The exchange is purely charitable in its purpose and uses.

So, a Women's Christian Association is, in Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Asso. (1889) 125 Pa. 572, 17 Atl. 475, held exempt from taxation as a public charity under a statute exempting the property of all institutions founded, endowed, and maintained by public or private charity, where there is no element of gain in the object or operations of the association, although it receives some compensation by furnishing with food and lodging the young women whose temporal, moral, and religious welfare it is the purpose of the association to improve. AULICK PALMER et al., Appts.,
v.

SARAH L. ERNESTINE KING.

(41 App. D. C. 419.)

Replevin — use of force to execute writ.

A marshal is liable in damages on his bond for an assault committed by his deputy in forcing his way through an open window in spite of the active resistance of the occupants of the premises, in order to execute a writ of replevin.

For other cases, see Bonds, II. c, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(February 2, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of a covenant of the official bond of a marshal. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clarence R. Wilson and Reginald S. Huidekoper, for appellants:

The entry complained of as trespass was lawful, as there was no "breaking" of the house of the appellee.

Even though the entry be considered a forcible breaking, the deputy marshal was not guilty of a trespass, because in the execution of the writ of replevin there is, in the officer executing the writ, the right to break and forcibly enter.

E. 100; Turner v. Simson, 137 Mass. 191.

Mr. Justice Van Orsdel delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, Sarah L. Ernestine King, filed a declaration in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against defendants, Aulick Palmer, United States marshal for the District of Columbia, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. The action is for damages upon the bond of the marshal and his surety to recover for an alleged breach of a covenant of the bond, which provided that the marshal, by himself and his deputies, shall faithfully perform all the duties of his office. The alleged breach grew out of the execution of a writ of replevin issued in a suit against one Allen S. King, husband of plaintiff, directed to the marshal, commanding him to seize a certain sewing machine, which, it afterwards developed, belonged to plaintiff.

It appears that the writ was placed in the hands of two of the marshal's deputies, who proceeded to the residence of plaintiff. One of the deputies rang the basement door bell, and plaintiff answered through an adjoining basement window, when the deputy stated that he had some legal papers for Mr. King, to which plaintiff replied that her husband was not at home, and suggested that the papers be left with her to deliver to him. She then opened the window, and the deputy started to climb through it. Plaintiff stood in front of the window, placed her hands on the shoulders of the deputy, and vigorously resisted his efforts to get through the window. He forced his way through, and, in doing so, pushed plaintiff against a shelf, whereby she sustained the injuries of which she complains. The sewing machine was in the front basement room and in plain view of anyone looking through the window.

Defendants filed a demurrer to the declaration, which was overruled. Thereupon they pleaded performance of the conditions of the bond, upon which plea issue was joined. From a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants have prosecuted this appeal.

The sole question presented by the appeal is whether or not the deputy marshal exceeded his authority in forcing an entrance through the open window, in spite of plaintiff's resistance, in order to execute the writ of replevin. That an assault was committed is settled by the verdict of the jury. It must be conceded that the deputy had no right, even in his official capacity, to commit an assault upon plaintiff, unless it appears that he had a legal right to force his way through the open window in disregard of her opposition, when, if she sustained injuries, it would be her misfortune, and not the wrong of the officer. The question presented does not involve the right of an officer to enter a dwelling through an open window where there is no resistance offered and where the entrance involves no element of force. The suit is not for trespass quare clausum fregit, but for trespass upon the person of the plaintiff.

Since we have no statute defining the powers of officers in executing a writ of replevin, the common law furnishes the rule of procedure in this District. At common law, as to the right of an officer to enter a dwelling in the service of civil process, no distinction seems to exist between entrance by outer windows and outer doors. Lee v. Gansel, Cowp. pt. 1, p. 1, Loftt, 374; Nixon v. Freeman, 5 Hurlst. & N. 647, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 271, 6 Jur. N. S. 983, 2 L. T. N. S. 361, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 315; Nash v. Lucas, L. R. 2 Q. B. 590, 8 Best & S. 531. In other words, it is not important that the entrance here was accomplished through an open window, if, under the same circumstances, it could have been accomplished lawfully through the door.

Counsel for defendants insist that the writ of replevin is an exception to the law generally applicable to the execution of civil process. It is urged that, where a specific chattel is to be recovered, the officer is not obliged to respect the peace and protection which the law secures to the householder. In a few instances, where this distinction has apparently been recognized, writs for the seizure of a specific chattel have been confused with writs of seisin or habere facias possessionem for the recovery of specific real property. In Semayne's Case, 5 Coke, 91, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 238, it is pointed out that, in respect of the execution of such writs against real property, there has been an adjudication adverse to the title of the holder, and the law no longer accords him any special privilege or security in it. "After judgment it is not the house in right and judgment of law of the tenant or defendant."

The authorities generally, with relation to the powers conferred at common law upon an officer in execution of the writ of replevin, go back to the resolutions in Semayne's Case. The following quotation from what was there decided is important: "But it was resolved, that it is not lawful for the sheriff (on request made and denial), at the suit of a common person, to break the defendant's house, sc. to execute any process at the suit of any subject; for thence would follow great inconvenience, that men as well in the night as in day should have their houses (which are their castles) broke, by color whereof great damage and mischief might ensue; for by color thereof, on any feigned suit, the house of any man, at any time, might be broke when . . . [he] might be arrested elsewhere, and so men would not be in safety or quiet in their own houses. . . . 5. It was resolved that the house of anyone is not a castle or privilege but for himself, and shall not extend to protect any person who flies to his house, or the goods of any other which are brought and conveyed into his house to prevent a lawful execution, and to escape the ordinary process of law; for the privilege of his house extends only to him and his family, and to his own proper goods, or to those which are lawfully and without fraud and covin there; and therefore in such cases, after denial or request made, the sheriff may break the house; and that is proved by the statute of Westm. 1, chap. 17, by which it is declared that the sheriff may break a house or castle to make replevin, when the goods of another which he has distrained are by him [i. e., the distrainer] conveyed to his house or castle, to prevent the owner to have a replevin of his goods, which act is but an affirmance of the common law in such points. But it appears there, that before the sheriff in such case breaks the house, he ought to demand the goods to be delivered to him: for the words of the statute are, after that the cattle shall be solemnly demanded by the sheriffs, etc."

This makes no exception of the writ of replevin. It expressly holds that an officer is not justified in breaking into a dwelling to seize the property of the owner upon civil process. The exception pointed out is where the goods of another than the householder are brought into his house to prevent lawful execution and to escape process of the law. In such case the process is not against the owner of the dwelling, and the privilege and security which extend to him and his family are not invaded by the breaking, after a solemn demand for admission has been made by the officer.

The statute of Westm. 1, chap. 17, only related to the exception pointed out in Semayne's Case. The act was said in that case to be but an affirmance of the common law. From this statement, it would seem that, at common law, the peace and security of one's castle never did extend to the protection of a person who took his chattels there for the express purpose of making it a refuge from the execution of civil process. The statute was enacted to restrict the private remedy of distress and to furnish the tenant relief from a wrongful and excessive distraint by his landlord. The remedy of replevin, until quite recent times, was only used for the recovery of chattels taken wrongfully upon a distress. 3 Bl. Com. 146. It has now become an ordinary statutory proceeding to adjudicate rights to the title or possession of personal property. In Corbett v. Pound, 10 App. D. C. 17, 25, this court said: "And with us it is so greatly regulated by statute (D. C. Rev. Stat. §§ 814-824), that it may be said to have wholly lost any common-law character which it may have had, and to depend for its efficacy entirely upon statutory provisions."

The rule of the common law in respect of the execution of the writ of replevin, as disclosed in Semayne's Case has been approved in many English cases. In Lee v. Gansel, Cowp. pt. 1, p. 1, Lord Mansfield, after holding that the entrance of an officer through an open outer door or window to execute civil process must be quiet and peaceable, said: "The sound maxim of policy is this, 'that a greater evil should be avoided for a less, and that a less good should give way to a greater.' The outer door, therefore, or window of a man's house, says the law, shall not be broken open by process. This has been long and well understood. The ground of it is this: that otherwise the consequences would be fatal; for it would leave the family within naked and exposed to thieves and robbers. It is much better, therefore, says the law, that you should wait for another opportunity than do an act of violence which may probably be attended with such dangerous consequences."

The rule of the common law, as deduced from the cases, seems to be that an officer, in executing a writ of replevin, may not break an outer door or window of a dwelling to gain entrance to seize the property of the occupant or of a person rightfully domiciled therein. He may enter either an open outer door or window, provided it can be accomplished without committing a breach of the peace; he may then, after a request and refusal, break open any inner doors belonging to the defendant, in order to take the goods. 3 Bl. Com. 417; Semayne's Case, 5 Coke, 91, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 238. We think a further reasonable rule is deducible from the cases that, when an officer, in the execution of a writ, finds an outer door or window slightly ajar, but not sufficiently so to admit him, he may open the door or window, provided he does not find it obstructed; but, if it is fastened or obstructed so as to require force to overcome the obstruction, he may not use such force, for such an entrance would constitute a breaking.

This rule has been recognized generally in this country where the common law has not been superseded by statute. In Prettyman v. Dean, 2 Harr. (Del.) 494, the court, considering an ordinary case of replevin, said: "The sheriff has a right to enter a house peaceably, where he finds the house open, for the purpose of executing a replevin. Being in, he has the right to execute the writ; if property be concealed, he has the right to break open inner doors, and generally use such force as is necessary to enable him to obey the command of his writ." To the same effect are Kelley v. Schuyler, 20 R. I. 432, 44 L.R.A. 435, 78 Am. St. Rep. 687, 39 Atl. 893; State v. Beckner, 132 Ind. 371, 32 Am. St. Rep. 257, 31 N. E. 950; Swain v. Mizner, 8 Gray, 182, 69 Am. Dec. 244; Snydacker v. Brosser, 51 Ill. 357, 99 Am. Dec. 551; 3 Freeman, Execution, ¶ 468.

But it is sought by counsel for defendants to make a distinction between breaking and forcible entry. It is urged that, inasmuch as the officer found the window open, and, in order to enter through the open window, only used sufficient force to overcome the resistance of plaintiff, it cannot be denominated a breaking. We are not impressed by this contention. The deputy, in order to enter, was compelled to commit a breach of the peace, and this was forbidden at common law. We are not disposed to make any distinction between a case where an officer finds a door or window slightly ajar, but obstructed; and where he finds it open, but the entrance obstructed by the lawful occupant of the dwelling, or otherwise, so as to require the exercise of force to overcome the obstruction.

In State v. Beckner, 132 Ind. 371, 32 Am. St. Rep. 257, 31 N. E. 950, where an officer put his foot between the door and the jamb, thus preventing the owner from closing it, and then forced the door open against the resistance of the owner, it was held to constitute a breaking. In State v. Armfield, 9 N. C. (2 Hawks) 246, 11 Am. Dec. 762, a constable having a writ of fi. fa. against the property of one Patterson went with the defendant Armfield to Patterson's house to make the levy. A member of the family, observing their approach, rushed into the house and attempted to shut the door, but before it was entirely closed, the constable pushed it open and entered the house. In the opinion, the court said: "The law is clearly settled that an officer cannot justify the breaking open an outward door or window, in order to execute process in a civil suit; if he doth, he is a trespasser. A man's house is deemed his castle, for safety and repose to himself and family; but the protection thus afforded would be imperfect and illusive if a man were deprived of the right of shutting his own door when he sees an officer approaching to execute civil process. If the officer cannot enter peaceably before the door is shut, he ought not to attempt it, for this unavoidably endangers a breach of the peace, and is as much a violation of the owner's right as if he had broken the door at first." So, in the present case, the action of the officer in overcoming the resistance of plaintiff at the open window to gain entrance was as much a violation of plaintiff's right as if he had broken open the window for the same purpose.

The judgment is affirmed with costs.

I. Scope.

Whether or not a dwelling house may lawfully be broken or forcibly entered in the execution of a writ or process in a civil suit, and if not, what is the effect of the levy or service thus unlawfully made, are questions of considerable practical importance. It is with the investigation of these that this note is concerned. Obviously, therefore, it does not involve the consideration of the somewhat analogous questions of the right to break and enter buildings other than a dwelling house to serve a civil writ or process,<sup>1</sup> or of the right to so enter either a dwelling house or any other building to execute a writ or process in a criminal proceeding. And accordingly, since search warrants for stolen property<sup>2</sup> and writs of arrest in contempt proceedings<sup>3</sup> partake more particularly of the nature of criminal processes, cases considering the question of the right to break a dwelling house in the execution of these writs are not included in this note.

II. General rule.

The common law, both in England and America, jealous of intrusion upon domestic peace and security, regards every man's house as his castle and fortress as well for his defense against injury and violence as for his repose. It is this ancient and well-known principle that underlies the whole law of the right to break and enter a dwelling house to serve a civil writ or process. Accordingly, therefore, the authorities are substantially agreed that, as a general rule, in the absence of statute, the outer door or other outside protection to a dwelling house may not, even after request and refusal of admittance, be broken or forcibly entered in the execution of a civil writ or process, either against the person or property of the householder,<sup>4</sup> except, perhaps, at the suit of the King.<sup>5</sup> Of course, if the door or other protection is open, and the officer can enter peaceably without force and violence, he may do so;<sup>6</sup> and being lawfully in the house, <sup>5</sup> Thus in Semayne's Case (Eng.) supra, it is said: "In all cases when the King is party, the sheriff (if the doors be not open) may break the party's house, either to arrest him, or to do other execution of the King's process, if otherwise he cannot enter. But before he breaks it, he ought to signify the cause of his coming and to make request to open the doors; and that appears well by the statute of Westm. 1, chap. 17 (which is but an affirmation of the common law), as hereafter appears; for the law without a default in the owner abhors the destruction or breaking of any house (which is for the habitation and safety of man) by which great damage and inconvenience might ensue to the party, when no default is in him; for perhaps he did not know of the process, of which, if he had notice, it is to be presumed that he would obey it, and that appears by the book in 18 Edw. II. Executions, 252, where it is said, that the King's officer who comes to do execution, etc., may open the doors which are shut, and break them, if he cannot have the keys; which proves, that he ought first to demand them, 7 Edw. III. 16." And see Keith v. Johnson (1833) 1 Dana (Ky.) in 604, 25 Am. Dec. 167.

<sup>6</sup> This is the view of substantially all of the authorities; but see in particular, Foley v. Martin (1904) 142 Cal. 256, 100 Am. St. Rep. 123, 75 Pac. 842; *Hager v. he is justified in using such force as is necessary to overcome any resistance he may meet with in the service of the process, being responsible only for the excess beyond what is necessary to enable him to accomplish his purpose. Nor does the fact that he is ordered to leave by the wife of the householder render him a trespasser in proceeding to make the service.<sup>7</sup> But where he finds the house closed, he must remain without, or else be a trespasser and liable as such. While this obviously enables the householder, by closing his house, to prevent the prompt execution of the mandate of the law, yet, in the eye of the law, it is better that the execution of the process should be delayed, and that the officer should remain without, waiting a favorable opportunity for the accomplishment of his purpose, than that he should enter with force and violence, against the wishes and protests of the householder, thus tending to breaches of the peace and the destruction of the security and tranquillity of the home by exposing it to attack from without.

This rule, with few exceptions, it is believed, is applicable to all writs and processes in civil suits. Thus, it has been deemed to apply to subpoenas,<sup>8</sup> summonses,<sup>9</sup> writs of attachment,<sup>10</sup> fieri facias,<sup>11</sup>

When an officer knocks at a door of a dwelling, and it is opened, he does not by this opening acquire the right of rudely intruding, telling the proprietor, who inquires what he wants or what his name is, 'that is none of his business,' and persisting, after he has said that he has a subpoena for the wife of the proprietor, and has been told that she is not at home, in searching the premises to satisfy himself of the truth of the information given him. Still less has he the right of thus intruding without the disclosure of his official character."

Discussing this question in the light of early English authorities, Walworth, Chancellor, in Curtis v. Hubbard (1842) 4 Hill (N. Y.) 437, 40 Am. Dec. 292, said: "The question whether the defendant in an execution had the right to close the doors of his house against the sheriff, to prevent a levy upon his property, appears to have been a matter of some doubt in England at a very early day. And Fitzherbert has a note of a case said to have been decided as early as 1325, Fitzh. Abr. title, Execution, pl. 252, H, 18 Edw. II., which is in favor of the right of the sheriff to enter the dwelling house forcibly, to seize goods upon execution. No such case, however, is to be found in the Year Books of that term; nor is it stated by Fitzherbert whether the execution was in favor of the King or of a private person. The question came before the Court of K. B. about one hundred and fifty years afterwards, Y. B. 18 Edw. IV. folio 4; and the decision was against the right of the sheriff to break the defendant's dwelling house with a view of levying an execution upon his goods therein. Again, in the latter part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 1602, in the case of Seyman v. Gresham, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2 (Eng.) 908 F. Moore, 668, Yelv. 29, the question was presented to the Q. B. for decision, in a suit brought against the owner of a house, who had closed his doors against the sheriff, so that he could not enter to take the goods therein which belonged to the defendant in the execution. Upon the first argument, according to the report of the case by Moore, Popham, Ch. J., and Mr. J. Gawdy, relying upon the note of the case in Fitzherbert, were clearly of the opinion that the sheriff might break the door of the dwelling house to execute the process against the goods. Fenner and Yelverton, the other two justices, being of a contrary opinion, no judgment was then given. But a fifth judge, Mr. J. Williams, being appointed in the K. B. in the first year of James the First, the case was again argued the next year; and Williams concurring in opinion with Fenner and Yelverton, the decision was made against the sheriff's right as reported by Ld. Coke, in Semayne's Case (1604) 5 Coke (Eng.) 91, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 228. By this decision, the right to close the outer door of the dwelling house upon the sheriff when he came with an execution, at the suit of a private person, to levy upon goods, was placed upon the same basis as the right to prevent a similar entry when he came with like process to arrest the person of the defendant; and that appears to have been considered the settled law of England ever since. It has also been constantly recognized as the common law of the several states of the Union where the English common law prevails. Nor does the fact that the defendant in the execution was not in his house at the time when the sheriff opened the door and went in, contrary to his known will on the subject, alter his rights. For a man's house is his castle, not for his own personal protection merely, but also for the protection of his family and his property therein, while it is occupied as his residence."

In Boggs v. Vandyke (1840) 3 Harr. (Del.) 288, "the court charged that an officer has no right to open an outer door if it be closed, for the purpose of levying an execution; if the door be open, he may go in and make his seizure; if the door be closed and the officer raps at the door and receives permission from the person within to enter, or if the door be opened to him, he may enter; but without such permission he cannot enter, and his doing so would make him a trespasser ab initio."

Naturally, a special deputy may not legally do that which his principal is forbidden to do. Calvert v. Stone (1849) 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 152.

<sup>12</sup> In Snyderacker v. Brosse (1869) 51 Ill. 357, 99 Am. Dec. 551, where the court said: "It is a uniformly recognized rule of the common law that no officer has the legal authority to break an outer door, or other outside protection to an individual's house, for the purpose of executing civil process. Even to arrest a defendant on civil process L.R.A.1916D.

the officer must corporally seize or touch the defendant's body and thus render him a prisoner, before he can justify the breaking and entering the defendant's house to retake him; otherwise, he has no such power, but must watch his opportunity to arrest him; for every man's dwelling house is looked upon by the law as his castle of defense and asylum, wherein he should suffer no violence. 3 Bl. Com. 288. And in the execution of civil process against the goods of a defendant, an officer is equally powerless to force an entrance into the house of the defendant, for the purpose of seizing them. Blackstone says a sheriff may not break open any outer doors to execute either a feri facias or a capias ad satisfaciendum; but he must enter peaceably, and may then, after a request and refusal, break open any inner doors belonging to the defendant, in order to take the goods. 3 Bl. Com. 417. And what is said of these writs is believed to be true of all civil process; and it follows that the writ of retorno habendo conferred no right on any constable to break an outer door or a window to effect an entrance into appellee's house."

All who act with the sheriff in the breaking must share with him the consequences of the illegal act. Hooker v. Smith (1847) 19 Vt. 151, 47 Am. Dec. 679. And an indictment does not lie against the debtor for assaulting the officer who has broken the door. State v. Hooker (1845) 17 Vt. 658. But as this note is not concerned particularly with the question of assault in resisting the officer who has broken the outer door, see note to State v. Selengut, L.R.A. 1916B, 957, as to assault in resisting seizure of property under process, where cases of this character are considered.

But where a bailiff was shot and killed by the defendant while seeking to break the latter's house to arrest him on a capias ad satisfaciendum, the offense of the defendant was manslaughter, and not murder. Cook's Case (1639) Cro. Car. (Eng.) 537.

In Hawkins v. Com. (1854) 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 395, 61 Am. Dec. 147, the court said: "It is true that with civil, instead of

for the sale of specific personal property.<sup>16</sup>

In an early English leading case<sup>17</sup> it was resolved that when any house is recovered by any real action, or by eject firmæ, the sheriff may break the house, and deliver seisin or possession to the demandant or plaintiff, for the words of the writ are habere facias seisinam or possessionem, etc., and after judgment it is not the house, in right and judgment of law, of the tenant or defendant.

Some courts, however, have confused cases of this kind with those in which the writ is directed against specific personal property, which, in the judgment of the law, is not that of the defendant. Thus, in a Kentucky case<sup>18</sup> it was decided that under a statute authorizing an execution for the specific thing recovered in deticriminal, process in his hands, whether the state or a private person be the plaintiff in the writ, and though it authorize the arrest of the defendant, the sheriff cannot break open the outer door of his dwelling without first having requested the door to be opened, and at the same time disclosing the purpose of his request." This, however, is mere dictum for which no authority is cited.

In Phillips v. Ronald (1867) 3 Bush. (Ky.) 244, 96 Am. Dec. 216, it is declared that whatever may have been the common law as to the breaking into dwelling houses in the nighttime to execute process, § 746, Civ. Code, gives full authority to the officer having a writ of arrest, for the purpose of executing it at any time, whether night or day, to break into any house or inclosure, first having given the proper notice of the writ and his purpose to execute it.

<sup>18</sup> Keith v. Johnson (1833) 1 Dana (Ky.) 604, 25 Am. Dec. 167, where, in holding that under the statute of 1828 (Sess. Acts, p. 159), authorizing an execution for the specific slave or thing recovered, a sheriff, if necessary to seize such property, is justified in entering into the defendant's dwelling house with force, if he find it closed and has reason to believe that the property sought is concealed therein, the court said: "The common law, jealous of intrusion upon domestic peace and security, did not permit an officer to break open an outer door of the defendant's dwelling house for the purpose of executing a ca. sa. upon the person, or of levying a fi. fa. on the goods of the defendant, unless the King was plaintiff. Every man's house was deemed his castle, and an ordinary judicial writ did not authorize the opening of the outer door, lest the King's enemies might enter; but the officer, once legally in the house, had a right to open an inner door. 3 Co. Inst. 162; Dalton, Sheriffs, 350. But executions in civil cases for specific property might have authorized the breaking of the house, if the officer could not otherwise execute the command of the writ. Executions for the specific thing which had been adjudged to be the property of the plaintiff were of that character; such, for example, as a writ of seisin, or an habere facias possessionem; because, 1, if resisted, the officer could not execute the writ, unless he employed force to overcome the resistance; 2, the thing had been judicially ascertained to be the property of the plaintiff, and not of the defendant; 3, the defendant would be guilty of a contempt of the court, and a prostitution of his sanctuary, by concealing within his closed walls that which he knew not to be his, and which the law had commanded him to surrender to the true owner. Hence, when a writ of seisin was resisted, the officer had a right to employ whatever force the exigency made necessary to enable him to enter the house, and to turn the defendant out and put the plaintiff in. Semayne's Case (Eng.) supra. Hence, too, on a process of utlagatum, as the defendant had been guilty of a persevering contempt of the law, the officer had a right to break into the house to execute the writ, either on his person or his goods; and hence, also, when a distrainer refused to surrender goods which had been replevied, and attempted to secure them in his house, the officer had right to employ all the force that was necessary to enable him to enter the house, and restore the goods. Dalton Sheriffs, 373; Semayne's Case (1604) 5 Coke (Eng.) 93, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 228. And it is well settled that a sheriff had authority, at common law, to enter the house of A by force, to levy a fieri facias on the goods of B, the defendant in the execution, if B's goods were in A's house. Semayne's Case (Eng.) supra; Penton v. Brown (1664) 1 Sid. (Eng.) 186. An execution on a judgment in detinue did not, according to the common law, authorize the officer to enter the house of the defendant by force, because the process was in the alternative, and the defendant might have nue, the outer door of the dwelling may be broken and entered, if necessary, in order to make a seizure. Obviously in the first case the judgment of the law that the house is not that of the defendant must necessarily deprive him of the protection of its outer door under the rule already considered. But in the latter case, it will be observed, the judgment of the law is that the specific personality in question is not that of the defendant, and how this can, in any manner, affect his right to his dwelling and the complete protection of its outer door is indeed difficult to see.

It has been stated, as a general rule, that the officer to whom a writ or order of replevin is directed may use what-discharged the judgment by tendering the alternate value; and because, also, the plaintiff might have distrained the goods of the defendant, to coerce a surrender of the specific thing which had been adjudged to him, the plaintiff. But now, since a plaintiff may have a peremptory execution for the thing alone, reason and analogy seem to authorize a forcible entry into the house of the defendant to take the specific property. Some of the reasons that authorized such an entry in virtue of a writ of seisin, a process of utlagatum, or to obtain restitution of goods that had been distrained and replevied, apply with full force to such a process as may now be issued in detinue. And, if the house of a stranger may be forcibly entered to levy a fiery facias on the goods of another person who is defendant in the execution, why may not the defendant's house be entered in the same way, in order to levy an execution on property which has been ascertained by a judgment against him to be, not his, but the plaintiff's? When a slave has been adjudged to be the property of the plaintiff, and when he elects to have a process to obtain the specific thing without evasion or alternative, why should not the officer have as much power under such a process as he would have under a writ of seisin commanding him to deliver possession of real estate to the plaintiff, or as he would have on the replevin of a distress to take and restore the identical goods which had been distrained; or as he would have under a fiery facias against B, to enter the house of A, and take the goods of B? The common law protects a man's house whilst it has his own goods in it; but it does not allow it to be closed upon a process against the goods of any other person; nor does it protect it when the process is issued against a specific thing which has been adjudged to the plaintiff, in a suit between him and the defendant, who has it in possession, and when it is either in his house, or the officer has good reason for suspecting that it is, and on proper demand is refused admittance."

ever force is reasonably necessary to enable him to enforce it.<sup>19</sup> The authorities, however, as is shown by the opinion in the annotated case, are not of one accord as to the right of the officer to break and enter a dwelling house in the execution of this writ.

A few cases sustain the view that the writ of replevin is an exception to the law generally applicable to the execution of civil process, and that the dwelling house of the defendant may be broken and entered, particularly after admittance has been demanded and refused.<sup>20</sup> This is upon the theory that the writ is for a specific chattel. These cases, however, have apparently confused writs for the seizure of a specific statute commands the sheriff to take the posse committatus, if necessary, is additional proof, the court declared, that an effectual remedy which could not be eluded was intended by the legislature. Keith v. Johnson (Ky.) supra.

<sup>20</sup> Howe v. Oyer (1889) 50 Hun, 559, 3 N. Y. Supp. 726; Keith v. Johnson (Ky.) supra; Jones v. Herron (1891) 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 183. In none of the cases, however, does this question appear to be necessary to the decision of the particular case. See, in this connection, the quotation from the Keith Case (Ky.) supra, note 18.

In the Howe Case, there was a statutory provision (N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1701, 2922) requiring that, if a chattel which an officer has process to seize is secured or concealed in a building or inclosure, he must publicly demand its delivery before breaking open such building or inclosure. The question really decided was that a constable, after knocking at the door of a dwelling house in which such property was, announcing his presence, calling out the name of the occupant, and learning that no one was within, did not have to make a formal public demand by reading aloud the list of articles which he was seeking to replevy, but could lawfully break and enter the house and take the property. Howe v. Oyer (N. Y.) supra. The court said, however: "The right of the officer to forcibly enter the building to replevy the property is not derived from the statute. By the common law an officer, in the execution of process directing him to take specific property, might forcibly enter any building containing it after having demanded and been refused admission for the purpose of the execution of such process."

In Jones v. Herron (Pa.) supra, the house of a stranger to the writ was broken to replevy goods of one occupying the second floor. The court said: "The rule undoubtedly is that in executing civil process generally he [the sheriff] cannot break open doors or enter by force; but there are exceptions to it, of which replevin is one of the most important. The reason is that chattel with writs of seisin and habere facias possessionem for the recovery of specific real property, which, as has already been pointed out, have entirely different effects upon the rights of the householder; and for this reason they are not believed to be well considered.

What, on the other hand, are regarded as the better considered cases, in strict accord with the law applicable generally to the execution of civil process, sustain the view that the defendant's dwelling house may not be broken or forcibly entered to serve a writ of replevin although admittance is first demanded and refused. According to these authorities the writ is but a civil process, and while the officer may enter peaceably to execute it when he finds the house open, yet if he enters with force and violence, against the wishes of the householder, he is a trespasser.<sup>21</sup>

a man's house is his castle for the protection of himself and his property against civil process, as a writ of fieri facias to take his goods in execution, or a capias in a civil suit by a private person. For the command of the writ being to take his goods to sell them under a fi. fa., he is entitled to the protection his castle affords him; but in a writ of replevin the command is to take the goods of a plaintiff who has entered security for their return if he fails to prove his title to the property, and under the common law and statute, the sheriff may break outer doors or enter by unusual ways for the purpose of executing the writ. Semayne's Case (1604) 5 Coke (Eng.) 91, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 228 is the leading case on the subject. It shows the instances in which the sheriff may break outer doors. Replevin is one of them, and this, it is said, is by statute Westm. 1, chap. 17. And although this statute is not among those reported to be in force in this state, yet it is said that the act is but an affirmation of the common law. Morris, Replevin, 113, 114; Semayne's Case. The sheriff may break open or beat down a castle, fort, or house, to make replevy and deliverance of cattle there imprisoned and withholden; but he may not break a close to make a replevin, where there is a gate, except that it be locked up. Dalton, Sheriffs, 353. Under the common law a man's house is his castle, and an officer cannot legally break in to execute a ca. sa. or fi. fa. upon the tenant or his goods, but he may do so where the process requires him to take possession of any particular thing, as to execute a writ of seisin, habere facias, replevin, or capias utlagatum. Keith v. Johnson (1833) 1 Dana (Ky.) 604, 25 Am. Dec. 167. By the common law an officer, in the execution of process directing him to take specific property, might forcibly enter any building containing it after having demanded and been refused admission for the purpose of the execution of such process. Howe v. Oyer (N. Y.) supra. Text writers have written the same way. See Freeman, Executions, § 468; Cobbey, Replevin, § 647; Murfree, Sheriffs, § 156. The foregoing applies to cases in which the owner of the house is the defendant in the suit in replevin. But where a third person is the defendant in such a suit, then the asylum which a castle affords is no asylum for him. In Semayne's Case, the 5th resolution was, "That the house of any one is not a castle or privilege but for himself, and shall not extend L.R.A.1916D.

to protect any person who flies to his house or the goods of any other, which are brought and conveyed into his house to prevent a lawful execution and escape the ordinary process of the law; for the privilege of his house extends only to him and his family, and to his own proper goods, or to those which are lawfully and without fraud and covin, there; and therefore in such cases, after denial or request made, the sheriff may break the house.' It is but polite, and therefore usual, to make demand first before breaking the doors, but the omission of this ceremony will not make the sheriff a trespasser. He acts, however, at his peril, for if he does not find the goods, he is a trespasser. But he is not an outlaw, and it is not lawful to beat him, for, if he gains admission by fraud, an assault on him is not justifiable. Rex v. Backhouse (1772) Loftt (Eng.) 62."

In State ex rel. McPherson v. Beckner (1892) 132 Ind. 371, 32 Am. St. Rep. 257, 31 N. E. 950, the court said: "A distinction has been made in some cases between the right of an officer to break the outer door of a dwelling house in the service of an ordinary execution, and of a writ which requires him to take possession of a particular thing, such as a writ of replevin, holding that in the latter case he may, after first demanding admittance, break down the outer door. Keith v. Johnson (Ky.) and Howe v. Oyer (N. Y.) supra. In the latter case the officer was proceeding under a statute giving him extraordinary powers where the property had been concealed, somewhat similar to that given a sheriff by our Code (§ 1271), and is therefore not in point here. The writ of replevin mentioned in Keith v. Johnson (Ky.) supra, was such as issues after the final ownership of the property had been determined by the judgment of a court, and

III. What constitutes outer door.

The determination of what is the outer door of one's dwelling house within the rule above stated is not always an easy matter. Of course, the ordinary case of a single tenement, occupied by a single family, is comparatively simple. And an entry through a hole in an outer wall into a small room, thence through a staircase window by tearing away the boards covering it, is unlawful if the hole is not intended to have a door or window hung in it, for then the staircase window is the outer protection of the house. But if the hole is intended to have a door or window put into it, it constitutes the outer door, and the removal of the boards from the staircase window is justifiable.<sup>22</sup>

Frequently, however, especially in congested city districts where space is an item of considerable importance, the same building may be used as the residence of a number of families, or as the residence and place of business of one or more families, and here is presented the difficulty. It has been decided that if distinct portions of a building are occupied by one as a dwelling and a store, the door of an entry common to both portions is not the outer door of the dwelling, and may be broken open to levy upon goods in the store.<sup>23</sup> But the door of a single room, used both as the owner of the dwelling been commanded to surrender the same to the true owner. The case is not an authority under a procedure such as is provided by our Code."

The question of the right to break the outer door of the defendant's house to serve a writ of replevin was not decided in Kneas v. Fittler (1816) 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 263. It did not appear in that case how the officers got into the house, and the court said that it could not be presumed that they broke the outer door.

In Indiana, a sheriff in actions of replevin may, under statute, § 1271, Rev. Stat. 1881, in some cases cause a building or inclosure to be broken open, but no similar statute give such a right to a constable, and except as modified by statute, the common-law principle that every man's house is to be treated as his castle and kept sacred from forcible intrusion prevails in that state. State ex rel. McPherson v. Beckner (Ind.) supra.

In Rentschler v. Fox (1902) 130 Mich. 498, 90 N. W. 275, it was held that under a statute (3 Comp. Laws, § 10,655) authorizing the officer with a writ of replevin to "break open any house, stable, outhouse, or other building in which such property may be concealed, having first demanded the deliverance thereof at the building or place where the same is concealed," a constable is not liable for unlocking the door of the defendant's dwelling to execute a writ upon the furniture therein after having first demanded admittance.

To replevy goods, the outer door of an untenanted dwelling may be broken, it seems. Stitt v. Wilson (1833) Wright (Ohio) 505.

<sup>23</sup> Stearns v. Vincent (1883) 50 Mich. 209, 45 Am. Rep. 37, 15 N. W. 86. The court said: "The protection of the dwelling against entry for the service of process is in the outer door only, and it is optional with the owner to take it by closing the door against the officer, or to waive it by allowing him to enter. If the officer once gains entrance through the outer door without force or fraud, the privilege is gone. L.R.A.1916D.

and he may force open any other door if necessary to make complete service of his process. If, therefore, the door which was forced by this officer was the outer door of the plaintiff's dwelling, the officer, if he had succeeded in entering the store while the door stood open, might lawfully have forced the door to what constituted the dwelling in fact. But nothing seems plainer than that any such application of the principle deprives that which constitutes the dwelling in fact, namely, all that part of the building which is occupied by the family for domestic purposes, of any privilege at all. If the outer door of the store is to be deemed in law the outer door of the dwelling, then when that door is passed, the officer, for the service of his process, may lawfully force his way through any inner door; and through the door which constitutes the entrance to the second story as much as any other. Williams v. Spencer (1810) 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 352; Hubbard v. Mace (1819) 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 127. But as the very nature of the business to which the lower story was devoted requires it to be kept open for general access of the public, and a general license is given to everybody to enter for business purposes, it is obvious that to treat the outer door of the store as the outer door of the dwelling for the purpose of domestic protection, would be to sacrifice the business to the privilege or to surrender the privilege altogether. If this were a necessity of the situation, it must be submitted to; but all the necessity there is in the case arises from giving to the dwelling a definition which makes it embrace something which in fact is no part of the dwelling at all. The moment we limit the application of the term 'dwelling house' to that which is occupied by the family for dwelling purposes, and treat the remainder as being what it is in fact, namely, a shop devoted exclusively for business purposes, all difficulty disappears, and it becomes easy to give the householder his privilege, without depriving the officer of any right in respect to the shop which he would have if what to the business is the unimportant circumstance that the owner lived under the same

a shop and dwelling, may not be so entered while the room is being used in the latter capacity.<sup>24</sup>

If a whole building is let to lodgers or tenants, each of whom occupies a distinct portion thereof, over which he exercises complete control, but uses an entry in common with all the other tenants, the door of his apartments or tenement, whether it leads into the air or into a covered way, and not the street door to the entry, is the outer door of his dwelling.<sup>25</sup> And the fact that there are several doors to the apartments of a roof instead of elsewhere did not exist. The officer, by following a customer into the store, would not then acquire the right to force his way into the dwelling, and the householder, by taking up his residence over the store, would not acquire the right to close his place of business against legal process,—a right which others do not have and which no principle of the common law was intended to confer. The privilege is thus preserved and absurd consequences avoided. The opposite conclusion would sacrifice both the privilege and the principle to a mere definition. In Swain v. Mizner (1857) 8 Gray (Mass.) 182, 69 Am. Dec. 244, it was decided that when a building is leased in distinct portions to several tenants, the door to the occupation of each tenant is to be deemed the outer door of his dwelling house, and that an officer, though he may be lawfully within the building, has no right to force such door for the service of process. The principle is applicable here. The outer door of the plaintiff's dwelling was the door into the part of the building occupied for domestic purposes, and it was behind that she must claim her protection, and not behind the door of the store."

of entirely distinct habitations. All the right to which the plaintiff or any other of the tenants of the different parts of the building in this common passage way was entitled was the right of using it for that purpose in the enjoyment of the tenements which they severally possessed. The apartments occupied by the plaintiff constituted, in and of themselves, a complete habitation for himself and his family. He had the sole and exclusive use and possession of them, as completely as if they stood separate and apart from everything else, and were in any other distinct structure. The privilege which the law allows to a man's habitation clearly ought to attach to apartments so situated. It arises from the great regard which the law has for every man's safety and quiet; and therefore it protects him from those inconveniences which must necessarily attend an unlimited power in the sheriff and his officers in this respect. Bacon Abr. Sheriff (N) 3. And this reason shows that the principle of law which gives protection to dwelling houses has no reference whatever to their quality, construction, or magnitude, but is solely for the purpose of insuring the quiet convenience and security of those who inhabit and dwell in them. Domestic security and peace would be equally disturbed by violence in breaking the doors and forcing an entrance into a dwelling house, whether it should consist of the entire portions of a building, or of separate and distinct apartments within."

It was contended in this case that the door constructed and used for closing the entrance from the street or public highway into the common hall or entry of the building is to be considered the only outer door of the tenant's dwelling house; that is to say, that his house consisted of the apartments occupied by him and of the hall and entry used by him in common with the tenants of all other parts of the building. Answering this contention, and distinguishing the case of Lee v. Gansel (Eng.) supra, the court said: "But this latter fact is by no means shown. On the contrary, these appear to have constituted no part of his tenement. He had an easement in them only, in common with others, who all equally enjoyed the like privilege for the purpose of gaining access to their respective tenements. Reliance is placed with much confidence by the defendant on the case of Lee v. Gansel (Eng.) above cited, as a decisive authority against the position of the plaintiff, that the apartments in the building in which the alleged trespass was committed constituted his dwelling house. But the facts in the two cases are quite dissimilar, and therefore the same conclusion tenant does not change the rule.<sup>26</sup> But if the landlord lives in the house with his tenants, even though he reserves to himself but a single room, he is considered in law the occupant of the whole, and the outer door of the house is the outer door of each tenant's apartment.<sup>27</sup>

Where a dwelling house is so constructed as to be capable of use as a double house or a distinct residence for two families, each family having an outer door, a door leading from one family's residence into that of the other may not lawfully be broken and entered unless it is of common use and passage for both families, at the pleasure of both, either to go out of, or as a passageway to the interior of, the house.<sup>28</sup>

is not necessarily to be deduced from each of them. From the statement of facts in the former case it appears that Gen. Gansel was a mere lodger in hired apartments in the house of Mayo, who was at the same time dwelling in it; that the apartments thus hired were in no way connected together, but were upon different floors; and that he had only a right in the kitchen, which clearly imports that he had no exclusive possession of the premises of which, to a certain extent, he had the use and enjoyment. But this plaintiff was a house-keeper, and not a lodger only. He was tenant of the apartments which he occupied; they were all on the same floor, and substantially connected together as a single tenement; he had the sole and exclusive possession of them; and in conducting and maintaining his domestic establishment he had no connection with or dependence upon the owner or the occupant of any other part of the building in which he resided. His tenancy resembles that of the occupants of chambers in the inns of court, and in colleges, opening upon a common staircase, which are conceded to be the dwelling houses of those who live in them. But further than this, it is distinctly stated by Lord Mansfield, that if that which was one house originally comes to be divided into separate tenements, and there is a distinct outer door to each tenement, they will be separate houses. But, without enlarging upon these considerations or seeking for any peculiar principles upon which the plaintiff's action may be maintained, we think it is clear that upon the precise facts stated in the bill of exceptions the apartments in the building, embracing all the rooms on one of its floors, which were hired by the plaintiff and occupied by him with his family as a separate and distinct tenement, constituted, while he was in such possession and use of them, his dwelling house; and that it was therefore entitled to the privilege and protection which the law affords to the habitations of men."

And where a house stood over a stable, and stairs, with a hatch gate at the bottom, led from the stable yard to an open

IV. What constitutes breaking and entry.

As to just what constitutes a breaking or forcible entry of the outer door or window of one's dwelling house, the authorities are not wholly agreed, although it seems quite clear that it is not necessary that such door or window or the locks and fastenings of either be actually broken or destroyed. What would be a breaking in burglary, it has been decided, is equally a breaking by the sheriff; and accordingly the right to even lift the latch of the door is denied.<sup>29</sup> But this is in conflict with other decisions to the effect that the door may be opened in the ordinary or usual manner, as by lifting the latch, turning the gallery, from which doors opened to different apartments, a door across that part of the gallery which led to the chamber of the party arrested was the outer door of his dwelling. Hopkins v. Nightingale (1794) 1 Esp. (Eng.) 90.

<sup>26</sup> Swain v. Mizner (Mass.) supra, where the court said: "For although it was said by Lord Mansfield in Lee v. Gansel (Eng.) supra, that the having of four outer doors would lead to the grossest absurdity, since the greatest house in London has but one, that is not the manner in which, according to our prevailing habits and modes of living, our dwelling houses are here constructed. Many might undoubtedly be found here having four, and it would perhaps be difficult to find a house of any moderate degree of pretension which has less than two outer doors. While all the doors opening into any of the apartments occupied by the plaintiff are closed, each of them may be considered, and must be treated, as an outer door. They are all necessary to protect the habitation from the intrusion of those who have no license to enter it. Whether an officer who had lawfully passed through one of them might afterwards, for the purpose of completing the service of his process, treat the others as inner doors, need not now be considered, because no such question arises upon the facts reported. The complaint against the defendant is confined to the breaking open of one of the doors, before he had obtained an entrance into any part of that portion of the building which was in exclusive occupation of the plaintiff."

knob, or sliding back the bolt, or turning the key left in the lock,<sup>30</sup> even after sealing a fence or a wall to get to it.<sup>31</sup> Using a duplicate key or picking the lock, being unusual ways of entering, are forbidden.<sup>32</sup>

A window which is partly closed may be opened further to make an entry,<sup>33</sup> but to open one which is entirely closed, although not fastened, is unlawful.<sup>34</sup> And when the outer door is closed a lawful entry cannot be made through a window, access to which is gained by opening a door into a closet and using a stepladder.<sup>35</sup> Likewise, opening a closed shutter is unlawful.<sup>36</sup>

And although neither the door nor window is closed or locked, an entry is nevertheless without justification if the householder is present, evidencing a desire to exclude the officer by closing his house against him, even after the latter is partly in. If a man merely latches his door, or if he purposely leaves the key in the lock upon the outside, he may perhaps be regarded as inviting all persons to enter his house who have business therein. But, however that may be, he certainly is not extending an invitation to enter if he locks the door and carries the key away in his pocket. Instead of making it easy to enter, he is thus doing all that he can to prevent an entrance, and if his landlord afterwards picks the locks, or (as in the case before us) avails himself of another key which happens to fit, he does a legal wrong as completely and of the same kind as if he broke down the door with a hammer."

An entry, however, upon the express invitation of a servant, in the absence of his master, unaccompanied by any fraud or violence on the part of the officer, is not unlawful.<sup>38</sup>

V. Persons protected by outer door.

The protection of the outer door extends not only to the householder and his goods, but to his children and domestic servants, his permanent boarders and lodgers, and all who have, without fraud or covin, made the house their lawful home. The repose and tranquillity of the family, which it is the purpose of the law to preserve, would be as much disturbed by a forcible entry to serve process upon a servant or boarder who has acquired by contract, express or implied, a right to enter the house at all times and to remain in it as long as he pleases, as if the object were to serve process upon the householder himself.<sup>39</sup>

Not every person, however, who may chance to be within the house, is entitled to the protection of its outer doors and windows. Thus, a stranger who flees there to escape arrest, on civil process, or to fraudulently conceal his goods from levy, is not so favored; and an officer, after demand and refusal of admittance where such would not be a useless ceremony, is justified in breaking or forcibly entering the house in order to execute the mandate of his writ.<sup>40</sup> Here, too, it would seem that the sanctity of the home is as much violated as if the

Upon these facts we are of opinion that this entry was lawfully made. The plaintiff's servant opened the door; the officer remained outside until invited to enter; he was under no legal obligation, unasked, either to disclose the reason why he wished to enter and see some one of the inmates, or to decline the offer of admission voluntarily made. If, upon knocking at the door, the occupant from within had bidden him to enter, he might have opened the door and entered without giving notice that he intended to serve process; if he had found the door open, he might have entered without summoning the master of the house to hear a declaration as to his intention. The entry, having been made without force, peaceably and even permissively, was quite within the demands of the law concerning the service of process."

In Semayne's Case (1604) 5 Coke (Eng.) 91, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 228, it was said: "The house of anyone is not a castle or privilege but for himself, and shall not extend to protect any person who flies to his house, or the goods of any other which are brought and conveyed into his house, to prevent a lawful execution, and to escape the ordinary process of the law; for the privilege of the house extends only to him and his family, and to his own proper goods, or to those which are lawfully and without fraud and covin there, and therefore in such cases, after denial on request made, the sheriff may break the house. And this is proved by the statute of Westm. 1, chap. 17, by which it is declared that the sheriff may break a house or castle to make replevin, when the goods of another which he has distrained are by him . . . [i. e., the distrainer], conveyed to his house or castle to prevent the owner to have a replevin of his goods; which act is but an affirmation of the common law in such points. But it appears there that, before the sheriff in such case breaks the house, he ought to demand the goods to be delivered to him; for the words of the statute are, after that the cattle shall be solemnly demanded by the sheriffs, etc."

So, in Gordon v. Clifford (1854) 28 N. H.

process were against the master of the house himself, but the law considers the latter as conspiring with the defendant in the writ, and will not allow him to make his house a place of refuge for strangers. An officer, however, acts at his peril in breaking and entering a dwelling to take the person or property of a stranger, for, if that which he is commanded to take is not there, he becomes a trespasser ab initio and is liable as such.<sup>41</sup> Likewise, if he enters with permission, and, after being directed to leave, forcibly or against the will and protests of the owner, goes upstairs, through passages and chambers, his conduct not only amounts to a trespass, but constitutes him a trespasser ab initio.<sup>42</sup>

VI. To complete levy or retake person arrested on civil process.

The outer door is not always a protection to those having a lawful domicile in the dwelling. For when the execution of the process has been properly commenced, the officer may afterwards break the outer door of either the house of the debtor or that of a third person, if necessary, for the purpose of continuing and completing the execution. If the defendant, after an arrest, escape and take refuge either in his dwelling house, or that of another, the officer may pursue, and, after demand and refusal of admission, unless such would be a useless ceremony, may break the house for the purpose of making recaption.<sup>43</sup> And the principle is the same where the officer has made a levy upon goods which he has not abandoned.<sup>44</sup> If the defendant afterwards shuts them up in his dwelling, and the officer cannot gain admittance upon a reasonable demand, he may force the doors for the purpose of regaining his possession and legal control over the property. A different rule would put the officer in a most perilous position. By the original levy, he makes 402, where the domicile of the defendant was fraudulently taken up with the express object of defeating the collection of a tax, the outer door was not privileged.

But when the officer is seeking the goods of the owner of the house, his justification does not depend upon their being found, as his house is the most natural place for the goods to be. And on the same principle, where there is a judgment against an administratrix de bonis testatoris, and she marries, the sheriff may enter her husband's house to search for the goods of the testator. Cooke v. Birt (Eng.) supra. And a sheriff may enter the house of a stranger to the writ when the doors are open, to execute a fieri facias de bona testatoris, if the goods are there. Biscop v. Where, after peaceably entering the outer door, the officer is forcibly expelled, demand of re-entry under such circumstances is not requisite to justify his breaking open the door. The law in its wisdom only requires this ceremony to be observed where it may possibly be attended with some advantage, and may render the breaking open of the door unnecessary. Allen v. Martin (1833) 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 300, 25 Am. Dec. 564; Aga Kurboolie Mahomed v. Reg. (1843) 4 Moore, P. C. C. (Eng.) 239. In the last case it is said: "Without an actual arrest, there was no rescous or escape; but the proposition that till an actual arrest had taken place, the prosecutor might forcibly expel the officer and those acting in his aid, and lock the outer door, so as to entitle himself to the protection of his castle, cannot be supported. The outer door being open, they were entitled to enter the house under civil process; and then being lawfully in the house, to arrest him, he was guilty of a trespass by expelling them. The act of locking the outer door was unlawful, and he could confer no privilege upon himself by that unlawful act."

himself answerable to the creditor for the goods, or for so much of them as will be sufficient to satisfy the debt; and if his control over the property is made to depend upon the will of the debtor, it is easy to see that the goods may be wasted or destroyed, and yet the officer be charged with the payment of the debt. When the levy has been duly made, the property is in the custody of the law, and the officer may do whatever is necessary for the purpose of maintaining his legal control over it. Merely because the officer did not remove the goods from the premises is no reason for likening this case to the suffering of a voluntary escape after an arrest upon a writ against the person.<sup>46</sup> And service upon the officer, between the levy of the writ and his forcible entry to regain control of the property, of a judge's order staying all proceedings upon the writ, preparatory to a motion to set it aside, does not affect the officer's right to break and enter the dwelling for the purpose mentioned.<sup>46</sup>

But simply having the property pointed out to him, without taking possession of it, is not sufficient to justify a subsequent forcible entry.<sup>47</sup>

But see Randall's Case (1820) 5 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 141, 1 Wheeler, C. C. 258.

In Groves v. Bloxom (1864) 3 Houat. (Del.) 544, it was decided that if the goods have previously been taken upon a fi. fa. and left in the house, the officer may lawfully take and carry them away under a venditioni exponas issued upon it, provided he does not use unnecessary force.

In State v. Coxe (1815) 2 Harr. (Del.) 495, note, the court said: "An entry to sell resembles the case of breaking open an outer door to retake one who has escaped after arrest on a capias ad respondendum, which may unquestionably be done, even on Sunday."

And in Hillman v. Edwards (1902) 28 Tex. Civ. App. 308, 66 S. W. 788, it was held that an officer who, in executing an order for the sale of specific property, has effected a lawful entry into the dwelling of the defendant, and thereby acquired the right to use all necessary force in making a levy, but who voluntarily leaves without doing so, is not entitled to re-enter the house by force.

While the voluntary departure of a person left in possession of the goods, merely to obtain refreshment, and with no intention of abandoning the distress, is not such an abandonment as to deprive him of the right to break and enter upon his return (Bannister v. Hyde (1860) 2 El. & El. (Eng.) 627, 29 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 141, 6 Jur. N. S. 171, 1 L. T. N. S. 438, the rule is otherwise, it seems, if the return is delayed too long. Thus, in Russell v. Rider (1834) 6 Car. & P. (Eng.) 416, one in possession of goods distrained for rent left the house in a state of excitement bordering on insanity, supposed by the landlord to have been produced by drugged liquor administered by someone in the house. After six days the landlord, apparently without demand of admission, broke into the house and carried away the goods. It was decided that he was not justified in breaking into the house after so long a delay.

In Com. v. Moreland (1890) 9 W. N. C. (Pa.) 272, where the constable had previously made a levy for rent in arrear in the regular way, and opened the door with a false key when he went back to sell, it was decided that an assault and battery upon him by the tenant was justifiable, as the officer was a trespasser. But see what is said in Murray v. Vaughn (1895) 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 657, about this case.

<sup>46</sup> Glover v. Whittenhall (1844) 6 Hill (N. Y.) 597 (fi. fa.), where the court said: "But it is not unusual in this state after a levy upon goods, to leave them in the possession of the debtor, either with or without a receiptor. It is an act of kindness towards the debtor, which, although it may render the officer answerable to the creditor, or involve him in difficulty with third persons, does not amount to an abandonment of the levy so far as the debtor himself is concerned. As to him, the property is still in the custody of the law, and the officer may come again at pleasure to complete the execution of the process."

<sup>47</sup> Thus, a constable, who went to a dwelling house with a writ of replevin for a sewing machine of one of the members of the family, and stated to the head of the family that he had a writ of replevin for the machine, but went away after the same was pointed out to him, without taking possession of it, was not, upon his return later in the day, justified in forcing open the outer door, which the head of the family had partly opened, but which she was endeavoring to close as soon as she learned who he was. State ex rel. McPherson v. Beckner (1892) 132 Ind. 371, 32 Am. St. Rep. 257, 31 N. E. 950.

The machine being in the house without fraud, the shifting of it to another room, and the substitution of another in its place could in no manner authorize the officer to break the outer door, he necessarily being in ignorance of the change, and having the right, when once lawfully admitted, to break down inner doors in the discharge of his official duties. (Ind.) Ibid.

If the officer has lawfully entered the debtor's house and seized the goods, he is justified in breaking open the outer door to carry away the property, there being no one whom he can request to open it.<sup>48</sup> Or if the sheriff's bailiffs, lawfully in the house, are locked in by the owner, the sheriff may break the outer door to rescue them and complete the execution.<sup>49</sup>

VII. Inner doors.

The privilege of the outer door or other outside protection to a dwelling house does not extend to all the doors of the house; and being peaceably in the building, the officer has the right to execute his writ. And, if the person or property sought be concealed, the officer has the right, after demand and refusal of admittance, when such will not be a useless ceremony, to break open inner doors, and generally to use such force as is necessary to enable him to obey the command of his writ. So rooms, even those of lodgers, closets, trunks, wardrobes, etc., may be entered in this way in search for the person or property sought under the writ.<sup>50</sup> And the officer, to arrest a lodger, who refuses

In Lee v. Gansel (1774) Cowp. pt. 1 (Eng.) p. 1, Lofft, 374, where it was sought to extend the privilege of the outer door to inner doors, Lord Mansfield said: "The books talk of the privilege of a mansion house and of the privilege of the door of it, which cannot be broken open. The whole question will therefore turn upon the extent of that which is called privilege. Now this rule of privilege, arising from a sound maxim of policy, is no privilege of a debtor properly speaking who absconds from justice in avoidance of legal process, but is annexed to the house and door (to which door I forbear at present to give any particular epithet), for the protection of a man and his family. It is therefore by consequence only, that the privilege is a protection to such a person, and not for his own sake. The sound maxim of policy is this: 'That a greater evil should be avoided for a less, and that a less good should give way to a greater.' The outer door, therefore, or window of a man's house, says the law, L.R.A.1916D.

shall not be broken open by process. This has been long and well understood. The ground of it is this; that otherwise the consequences would be fatal; for it would leave the family within, naked and exposed to thieves and robbers. It is much better, therefore, says the law, that you should wait for another opportunity, than do an act of violence, which may probably be attended with such dangerous consequences. But as this is a maxim of law in respect of political justice, and makes no part of the privilege of a debtor himself, it is to be taken strictly, and not to be extended by any equitable analogous interpretation. The oldest case to be found in the books that takes notice of this privilege and warrants it, and upon which authority it was allowed at all, is a case in the Year-Book 18 Edw. IV. p. 4, pl. 19. 'There, an action of trespass was brought for breaking the outer door in execution of a fieri facias. The court held that trespass would lie, for the officer shall not break open an outer door to execute his process; but when the officer had so got in, he broke open a trunk, and took out the goods that were in it; in respect of which they held that trespass would not lie; for he had a right to break the trunk, and take the goods.' I quote this case not to imply that I should perhaps have been of the same opinion myself in a case of the first impression; but to shew, that the rule of privilege is taken most rigidly. Afterwards, in Semayne's Case (1604) 5 Coke (Eng.) 93, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 228, the same strict doctrine was held, namely, 'that breaking open the outer door was a trespass, but that taking away the goods was lawful.' In (1602) Yelv. 29, which was the same case, Popham doubted whether even the outer door was privileged, because it would be a hindrance to justice; but afterwards, in (1604) 5 Coke (Eng.) 92b, 93a, the whole court held, 'that the outer door ought not to be broken open;' and grounded their opinion upon the single authority of 18 Edw. IV. p. 4, pl. 19, before quoted. You see from hence with what rigour the privilege has been construed in the oldest cases. But no case or dictum has been cited at the Bar, nor indeed did there ever exist a case, which intimated a doubt whether an inner door might not be broken open. In Parke v. Evans (1812) Hobart (Eng.) 62a, and Waterhouse v. Saltmarsh (1619) Hobart (Eng.) 263a, among other outrageous things the bailiff broke open a chamber door, having entered legally at the outer door; but such breaking was held lawful, the first entrance at the outer door which was open, having been legal; and yet the latter was a very harsh case, for they broke in when the man and his wife were in bed, and behaved with great violence and outrage. But I lay stress on this to show how strictly the privilege has been understood, when the outer door or window is secure, and when the entrance has not been forcible through either of them, so as to lay open the house and its inhabitants to insult and violence from without; but, on the contrary, has been quiet and peaceable. In addition to these authorities, I recollect a note of a case lately determined, which says, 'an inner door has no protection at all.' It was the case of Astley and Pindar, and was heard in the year 1760, Mich. 1 Geo. II. There, all the other charges against the bailiffs were answered except breaking the inner door, which was accompanied with such violence that the door fell, and the officer with it into the room; but all the court were of opinion that the officers, having lawfully entered at the outer door, might break open the inner to execute the duty of their office. Besides these cases, and in conformity to the principles upon which they have gone, I shall cite a very sensible and material distinction from a book in my hands, which is Fost. C. L. title, Homicide, chap. 8, § 20, which is this. 'The rule that every man's house is his castle, when applied to arrests on legal process, has been carried as far as political justice will warrant, and perhaps further than in the scale of reason and sound policy they will warrant. But in cases of life we must adhere to rules well known and established. But this rule is not one of those that will admit of any extension. It must, therefore, as I have before hinted, be confined to the breach of windows and of outer doors intended for the security of the house against persons from without, endeavoring to break in.'

In Ratcliffe v. Burton (1802) 3 Bos. & P. (Eng.) 223, Lord Alvanley, Ch. J., answering the question whether an officer who enters one's house to serve a civil process without any particular reasons for supposing him to be there has a right to break open such inner doors as happen to be shut, without any previous demand of admittance, said: "If the officer have certain knowledge that the party is within the house, it might be absurd for him to demand any admittance; since if he were to do so, the party might possibly escape by the window while the officer was demanding admittance at the door. No authority has been cited to show that where the officer enters merely for the purpose of ascertaining whether the party be there, he can justify violence for that purpose without a previous demand of admittance. It L.R.A.1916D.

would be carrying the law upon this subject to an alarming extent, if the court should hold that because a man happens to owe money in any part of England, the sheriff of the county in which his house is situated may break open every door and every trunk in which a man might be concealed, and this as often as he should think proper before the return of the writ. It appears to me that the law has gone quite far enough upon this subject. It has said that the outer door of the house is the man's castle, but that the inner doors may be broken open for the execution of civil process. It has never said, however, that the officer may justify breaking the inner doors without averring a previous demand of peaceable admittance, or shewing why such violence was necessary. Without such averment, it does not appear that he did nothing more than was necessary towards making a reasonable search. In this case the defendant neither states that the party was there, nor even that he had reasonable ground for suspicion. Had neither of these circumstances been stated, I do not say that he would have been guilty of a trespass. I desire to be considered as confining these observations to the case of civil process only, without in any degree extending them to the case of criminal process. The present, therefore, being a case of civil process, I do not think the justification stated by the defendant sufficient to entitle him to the judgment of the court."

The opinion of the other judges were to the same effect. And while Hutchison v. Birch (1812) 4 Taunt. (Eng.) 619, 13 Revised Rep. 703, wherein the sheriff was seeking goods under a fi. fa., has been regarded as casting some doubt upon this decision, it is not believed to establish a rule that demand of admittance is never necessary, for the plea, as Lord Alvanley in the earlier case said it must, showed why it was necessary to break the door; namely, "because the sheriff could not otherwise get at the goods."

In Kneas v. Fitler (1816) 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 263, the court said: "It has been contended on the part of the plaintiff, that the sheriff's officer who executes a replevin enters the defendant's house at his peril, although the outer door be open, and that he is a trespasser if the goods be not found there; but I do not take the law to be so. The writ commands the sheriff to replevy certain goods which are in the possession of the defendant; he has a right, therefore, to enter the defendant's house for the purpose of searching for the goods, I say nothing of his right to break the outer door, in case of being refused admittance, because the point does not arise in this case. Hard, indeed, would be the condition of the officer, if the legality of his entry depended on the contingency of his finding the goods, and strange would be the law, if the defendant in replevin, by adding wrong to wrong, by secreting or removing from his house the goods which he had unlawfully taken, should have an action against a minister of justice, for coming to search, according to him admission to his bedroom, is justified in leaving the house, and breaking an outer window of the apartment.<sup>51</sup>

But a mere suspicion that a stranger is in the house is not sufficient to justify the breaking of inner doors, and if the party sought is not there, the officer is a trespasser ab initio.<sup>52</sup>

VIII. Effect of levy or service.

While there is some conflict as to the effect of a levy or service effected by an unlawful breaking of the outer door or the command of his writ, for what there was good reason to suppose would be found.<sup>53</sup>

If an officer with a writ of replevin enter and make search upon the invitation of the owner of the dwelling house, he is not liable in damages unless he does unnecessary injury in the search. Bruce v. Ulery (1883) 79 Mo. 322.

If he search property belonging to a stranger to the writ, found in the house, upon the invitation of the latter, and under a bona fide impression that it is the property of the defendant, the same rule of liability applies. (Mo.) Ibid.

If the plaintiff in the writ accompanies the officer, the same rules apply to him. (Mo.) Ibid.

And breaking the door of the bedroom of a lodger under a ca. sa. is not sufficient to entitle him to a discharge from custody, where the officer was lawfully in the house. Levitt v. Dymoke (1868) Ir. Rep. 3 C. L. 1.

In Ilseley v. Nichols (1831) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 270, 22 Am. Dec. 425, the leading case on this question in this country, the court, after reaching the conclusion that a valid and lawful act cannot be accomplished by an unlawful means, said: "But upon window of a dwelling house, due chiefly to the dictum of a few early English decisions, the American cases, which contain the better considered opinions on the question, are substantially agreed in holding that the levy or service so made is void. This, it is believed, is the only logical result of the general rule of non-entry of the outer door, as to hold otherwise would be to put a premium upon force and violence, and result in the creation of a legal right by the doing of an illegal act.<sup>53</sup> And it has been de-more general grounds, assuming the question to be open for examination, both upon considerations of principle and policy, it appears to the court that it would be dangerous to establish the rule that although a man's house is his castle, his asylum, and it shall not be forced for the purpose of serving civil process, and upon a balance of the considerations of expediency, the law holds it wise to allow this exemption in favor of the peace and security of families by day and by night, even though the service of civil process is thereby delayed or defeated, yet that a legal right of property may be acquired by the direct violation of this settled and salutary principle of law. Such a decision would afford a direct encouragement to the rash and turbulent creditor to violate the rules of law, and to do that which might lead to an open breach of the peace, by giving legal effect to his attachment, if he can procure force enough to make one by unlawful and violent means. It is to be recollected that an officer, whilst acting within the scope of his authority and in conformity to the rules of law, is not only entitled to the protection of the law, but has power to command the assistance of all other citizens; and the law extends the like protection to them. But it would be placing such officer and his assistants in a most critical and questionable predicament if they could be employed in making a lawful attachment by unlawful means. Should the officer refuse to make an attachment under these circumstances, even where the doors are forced by others for the purpose of enabling him to enter and make the attachment, would he be responsible to the creditor for the nonfeasance? Would citizens be liable to damages, or to punishment, were they to refuse to aid an officer who should undertake to make such attachment? Should resistance be made from within, and force be repelled by force, would not the assailants be acting unlawfully; would not the owner and inmates of the house be acting lawfully? Should death ensue, would it not be murder in the assailants? But it is unnecessary to multiply questions with a view to suggest all the possible ill consequences which must arise from holding that the act is wrongful, and yet that a valid right can be acquired by means of such wrong act. The consequences must be obvious. If such a transaction can take place in the daytime, it may in the night. If the owner of the house may defend by force himself, he may call in the assistance of others. If his house is assailed by force, he may use adequate force to repel it. To such a conflict of rights and powers, we think the establishment of the proposition contended for by the defendants would directly lead. They can only be avoided by either legalizing the attachment and the means of affecting it, by authorizing the officer to break open the doors of a dwelling house to serve civil as well as criminal process, and by placing within his reach a sufficient force to enable him to accomplish it, by holding all resistance unlawful, and by thus throwing around the officer and his assistants the broad shield of the law for their protection; or else, by holding that when the means are unlawful, all the declared objects and purposes to be accomplished thereby are alike unlawful, and that no legal right can thereby be acquired, either by the officer himself or by his employers. But as it is a well-settled rule of law, established upon considerations of policy, that the doors of a dwelling house cannot lawfully be forced for the service of civil process, we think it follows, as a necessary legal consequence, that no valid attachment can be thereby made."

Reviewing some of the authorities having an apparently different aspect from this position, the court further said: "In Bacon's Abridgment, and by other respectable compilers, it is stated that on a capias, or feri facias, the sheriff is not authorized to break the door of a dwelling house, though the execution would be good. Bacon, Abr. Sheriff (N) 3. The authorities on the subject are stated with great clearness and fullness in a note by Mr. Metcalf, the American editor of Yelverton's Reports, p. 29. On a reference to the case in the Year Book 18 Edw. IV. folio, 4, which is usually cited as the foundation of the supposed rule, we think it is quite manifest that the real point decided there was, that a sheriff is not justified in breaking a dwelling house in order to execute a feri facias, for a feri facias will not excuse an officer for breaking a dwelling house. Lord Coke, in his report of Semayne's Case (1604) 5 Coke (Eng.) 93, Smith, Lead. Cas. 228, refers to the same case in the Year Books, and says it was resolved by Littleton and all his companions, 'that the sheriff cannot break the defendant's house by force of a feri facias, but he is a trespasser by the breaking, and yet the execution which he then doth in the house is good.' It is obvious, from the facts, that this point was not raised or decided in Semayne's Case, and it is not mentioned by the other reporters of the same case. In Lee v. Gansel (1774) Cowp. pt. 1 (Eng.) p. 1, Loft, 374, though the above cases are cited by Lord Mansfield, as they stand, yet he used them for another and distinct purpose, and he expressed no opinion, nor had he, in the case before him, occasion to express any, upon the point now under consideration."

The court also said: "In Heminway v. Saxton (1807) 3 Mass. 222, the action was trespass quare clausum, against a deputy sheriff and his assistants, alleging that they broke and entered the plaintiff's dwelling house, and took and carried away sundry articles of property, with other wrongs. The defendants justified under a writ against the plaintiff and an attachment of the goods made thereon; but the plaintiff had judgment. No question was made of the validity of the attachment, and it does not appear whether the value of the goods was included in the damages; and it is not, therefore, a direct authority for anything more than that it is unlawful to break a dwelling house, in order to make an attachment upon a writ, and that an action of trespass will lie for it, by the owner, whose goods are thus attached, against the officer. But as it is a general rule in trespass, that the plaintiff shall be indemnified for all losses sustained in consequence of the tortious act of the defendant, and as the value of the goods is commonly the most considerable, and often the only item of loss in such cases, it may be presumed that if a different rule had been adopted in this case, some notice would have been taken of it. If the damages were given according to the usual rule, the case is an authority against the validity of such an attachment. In Widgery v. Haskell (1809) 5 Mass. 155, 4 Am. Dec. 41, Parsons, Ch. J., referred to the common position found in the compilers, as it would naturally present itself to his recollection at the moment, as an apt illustration of the argument which he was enforcing. The proposition he was illustrating was this: That the protection of a debtor's effects from attachment in his house is not the design of the law, but only an incidental protection, resulting from the provision that a man's house is his castle. He then adds: 'And if his effects are found without his castle, they may be attached; and even in his castle an attachment would be good, although the party might be punished as a trespasser for invading the castle.' This dictum would be entitled to great weight had it been the result of examination and reflection; but we think it very manifest that it was not. The case turned upon the validity of a trust assignment by an insolvent debtor, to an assignee of his own choice, without the act or consent of any of his creditors; and one argument in support of it was, that in effect a debtor might do the same thing; that is, dispose of his property at his own will, without the assent of his creditors, by collecting his effects within his dwelling house and paying whom he pleased. It was this argument which the chief justice was answering; which he did very powerfully, by showing that although a debtor might do this, it was not because the law deemed it a purpose just and lawful in itself, and one which might be accomplished in other modes, but was necessarily incidental to another and higher principle of the law, designed to afford security to a man and his family, by the protection of his dwelling house. It was, therefore, concluded that this protection could not be extended to a conveyance in trust, of goods not within the debtor's dwelling house. That part of the proposition which we are now examining, that the attachment of the property would be good, though the entry of the house was wrongful, was obviously not a point in the case; as it is everywhere conceded that the protection of the dwelling, and not an immunity of goods from attachment on civil process, is the object of the legal maxim, we think it equally clear that this position was not necessary to support the argument which the chief justice was maintaining."

In this same connection Walworth, Chancellor, in Curtis v. Hubbard (1842) 4 Hill (N. Y.) 437, 40 Am. Dec. 292, said: "The remaining question is, whether a sheriff, who has entered the house of another in direct violation of the law, for the purpose of arresting the owner or seizing his goods, can be justified in consummating the wrong by arresting his person or removing the goods, where it is all one continuous act. I think, upon authority as well as upon principle, he cannot. And I fully concur in the opinion of the learned Chief Justice of Massachusetts in the case of Ilseley v. Nichols (1832) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 270, 22 Am. Dec. 425, upon this question. As a general rule, no person can acquire a right to the custody of the person or the possession of the property of another by his own illegal act. And I think this would never have been considered an exception to that rule, had not the language of the case cited from the Year Books been misapprehended. In Semayne's Case, either the counsel, or one of the judges who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court, is represented as saying: 'By Littleton and all his companions it is resolved that the sheriff cannot break the defendant's house by force of a fieri facias, but he is a trespasser by the breaking, and yet the execution which he then doth in the house is good.' But that certainly could not have been intended as a translation of the language in the case in the Year Book 18 Edw. IV. And Cowper has done great injustice to Ld. Mansfield by quoting, as if it was his own language, a statement of that case which bears no resemblance to the note of the decision as it is in the Year Book. A very fair translation of the whole case is given by Mr. Metcalf, in his note to the case of Semayne v. Gresham (1602) Yelv. (Eng.) 29; which translation does not vary materially from that of Mr. J. Cowen in the case of People v. Hubbard (1840) 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 371, 35 Am. Dec. 628. The substance of it is, that the sheriff had an execution against a party in a civil suit who had locked up his goods in a chest in his house; and the sheriff went and broke open the house and seized the goods and carried them off. The case being stated to the court for its decision whether the sheriff was guilty of a tort, Littleton and his associate judges held that L.R.A.1916D.

the party injured might have a writ of trespass against the sheriff for breaking his house, notwithstanding the execution; for, as they say, 'the fl. fa. will not excuse him of the breaking of the house, but of the taking of goods only.' Not that it would excuse the sheriff for having taken the goods in this particular case, after he had wrongfully broken into the house where they were. But the words 'des biens,' which, literally translated, is 'of the goods,' seem to have led to the erroneous conclusion that the court meant to decide that the taking of the goods in the particular case then stated to the court was a justifiable act, notwithstanding the breaking of the house to get access to them. In the French and Norman French languages, the article is frequently used in cases where we dispense with it. And 'des,' which appears to be a contraction of the preposition 'de' and the article 'les,' is used where we make use of the corresponding preposition only. Thus, the English expression, 'the laws of men,' would, in French, be 'les lois des hommes;' that is, literally, 'the laws of the men.' Ld. Mansfield, who seems to have taken it for granted that in the case in the Year Books the court had decided that the taking of the goods was lawful notwithstanding the illegality, intimates that he would not probably have so decided in a case of the first impression. Lee v. Gansell (1774) Loft (Eng.) 381; Cowp. pt. 1, p. 6. And it is certain no such question could have arisen in Semayne's Case, as no goods had been there taken by the sheriff; for it was an action against the owner of the house for shutting his doors and refusing to permit the sheriff to enter and seize the goods. The fact also that in the subsequent case of Yates v. Delamayne (1777) (Eng.) cited in Bacon Abr. title, Execution (N) the court set aside the levy on an execution, because the sheriff had illegally entered the defendant's house to execute the writ, is conclusive to show that it was not then considered as settled law in England that the sheriff had a right to seize the defendant's goods after having obtained access to them by his own wrongful act. That case, too, appears to have been decided in 1776, only two years after the case of Lee v. Gansell, and while Ld. Mansfield continued to preside in the Court of K. B."

In Bailey v. Wright (1878) 39 Mich. 96, the court said: "It is admitted this was a trespass, but it is claimed the levy may be a good levy in spite of the wrongful acts by which it was accomplished. We think this is too dangerous a doctrine to be tolerated. Public policy requires above all things that courts and officers executing their process shall respect the lawful rights of all persons. The practical permission which overzealous officers would receive to commit wrongs with substantial impunity, if their levies should be held good without regard to the manner of their enforcement, would remove every check on lawlessness. To hold that an act is lawful which may be lawfully resisted is absurd. Such miscon-

cided that the levy being unlawful, a sale of the property is illegal, and that the debtor is not responsible for expense of the levy and sale.<sup>64</sup>

duct should neither be justified nor winked at. Any officer who breaks the law should be held to be entirely without excuse, and as fully responsible as any other malefactor. The doctrine on this subject is so fully discussed in Ilseley v. Nichols (1831) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 270, 22 Am. Dec. 425, and People v. Hubbard (1840) 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 369, 35 Am. Dec. 628, that we need not go into any further investigation. The doctrine is sensible and just, and is the only one whereby private safety and public peace can be preserved. There can be no respect for courts and their process if their ministers are upheld in violations of law, or if they can be lawfully opposed in exercising their functions, as they may be if such levies are held valid."

In Hodgson v. Towning (1836) 5 Dowl. P. C. (Eng.) 410, a defendant arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum after the officer had broken an outer door was discharged out of custody on a summary application.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE WATER COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

H. E. LALLY.

(168 Ky. 348, 182 S. W. 186.)

Water company — negligent turning on of water — forcing open faucet.

A water company cannot be held liable for negligently turning water into the pipes of a house so violently as to force open a screw faucet and flood the property, since such forcing of the faucet would be impossible.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch Fourth Division of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent flooding of plaintiff's house. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. J. Carroll, for appellant:

If the injury would not have occurred but for the plaintiff's negligence, he cannot recover even if the defendant is guilty of negligence.

Messrs. O'Neal & O'Neal and C. H. Searcy for appellee.

Clarke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee lived at 225 Shawnee Drive,

Note. — As to power of court to disregard testimony because contrary to scientific principles, see annotation following this case, post, 301.

Louisville, Kentucky, on the 28th of July, 1914, and owned the property. About 5 o'clock in the afternoon he, his wife, and three children were leaving the house to spend the evening with his brother, when, through one of the children wanting a drink, it was found the water had been turned off from his house, and none could be drawn from the faucets. They left their home and returned about half-past 10 o'clock that evening, when they discovered that the water from the faucet at the washstand in the bathroom on the second floor had overflowed the basin, and flooded a considerable portion of the house, damaging the walls, floors, and furnishings.

Appellee instituted this action against appellant, and recovered a judgment for $694 for the damage sustained by reason of the flooding of his house, and appellant, having been denied a new trial, is appealing.

Appellee's petition as amended alleges that the flooding of his house was caused by the gross negligence and carelessness of appellant in suddenly turning on and into the pipes of his home a large and tremendous volume of water of extreme velocity, in such way and manner as to forcibly cause same to run through the faucet and piping in said residence, thereby causing and permitting said water to flood the premises.

The evidence shows that the water was turned back into the pipes supplying appellee's house and other houses in the neighborhood within a short time after he left his home. The only evidence that can be construed to indicate that there was any negligence in the way in which the water was turned on again into these pipes by appellant is given by two ladies living in the same square with appellee, who testify that when the water was turned on upon this occasion the pipes and faucets in their homes were caused to shake and to make such an unusually loud noise as to frighten them. None of the pipes or faucets in any of these residences were broken or bursted, or damaged in any way. Appellee testifies that the faucet from which the damaging water flowed was in perfect condition, both before and after the accident; that no pipe or fixture or fastening in his home was hurt or damaged by the turning on of the water. There is no explanation in any of the proof from which it can be conceived how the faucet that caused this damage could have been turned on by the force, volume, or velocity of the water returning into the pipes, not even from the testimony of the two ladies, to whom we referred above, that the water had been turned into the pipes by appellant with such unnecessary and unusual force as to cause the pipes to rattle and give forth a loud noise. Appellee testifies that, when he went up to examine the cause of the flooding of the house, he found the faucet of the washbasin open to such an extent that it required two or three turns to close it; that the faucet was one of those screw faucets that turn, comparatively new, and that it was not hurt.

Counsel for appellee have not favored us with a brief; neither the pleadings nor the proof afford any reasonable explanation of how that faucet could have been turned on by the return of the water into the pipes when turned on by appellant, and we are unable to imagine how that could have done it. The only explanation, consistent with physical and mechanical laws with which we are familiar, that we are able to imagine, is that appellee, or some member of his family, left the faucet turned on, and that the waste pipe from the basin was obstructed in some way, which prevented the water from escaping through the waste pipe as fast as it came through the faucet, and that the overflow was caused in this way. We have been unable to discover the scintilla of evidence of negligence upon the part of appellant that would justify the court in overruling its motion for a peremptory instruction at the close of appellee's testimony. The evidence in this case can supply the necessary scintilla only by the indulgence in the theory that the force with which appellant turned the water into the pipes opened the faucet by unscrewing it at the washstand, and that would be to suppose a circumstance inherently impossible and absolutely at variance with well established and universally recognized physical and mechanical laws. Water may be turned into pipes with sufficient force to burst them or tear off fixtures such as the faucet, but not so as to unscrew the faucet.

This court, in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Chambers, 165 Ky. 705, 178 S. W. 1041, after stating the "scintilla rule" prevailing in this state, said: "These rules cannot apply where the only evidence upon which such adverse party rests his right to succeed consists of a statement of alleged facts, inherently impossible and absolutely at variance with well-established and universally recognized physical laws."

If a statement of alleged facts inherently impossible and absolutely at variance with well-established and universally recognized physical laws will not supply the required scintilla of evidence, a theory inherently impossible based upon a statement of alleged facts certainly cannot supply it.

If this case should be tried again, instruction No. 3 should not be given, as it completely destroys the effect of instruction No. 4, which correctly presented the defense of contributory negligence.

It results, therefore, that appellant's motion for a directed verdict should have been sustained, and the judgment herein is reversed and remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

about which there is no conflict, and which was a basis of a judgment in the lower courts, will be reviewed and the judgment reversed if justice requires. Hudson v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1895) 145 N. Y. 408, 40 N. E. 8.

Testimony of witnesses which is contrary to physical law is of little or no value whatever. McLeod v. Miller (1915) — Nev. —, 153 Pac. 566.

But in order that testimony as to the manner an injury was inflicted may be disregarded as contrary to physical laws, it must be shown to be such by demonstration, and not by mere conflict of evidence; and such demonstration must be shown affirmatively, and not depend upon the credibility of witnesses. Winkler v. Power & Min. Machinery Co. (1910) 141 Wis. 244, 124 N. W. 273.

While appellate courts uniformly refuse to weigh evidence, they do not renounce the right to reject entirely the testimony of witnesses found to be repugnant to physical law and facts. Testimony to be entitled to any weight must be within the bounds of reason; failing in this it cannot be denominated evidence, and should be cast out as devoid of probative force. But when the testimony of witnesses can reasonably be reconciled to the physical facts, the courts will not reject it, nor weigh it, notwithstanding it may believe the weight of physical evidence opposes that given by witnesses. It is the duty of courts to determine what constitutes substantial evidence, and the business of triers of facts to settle conflicts therein. Stafford v. Adams (1905) 113 Mo. App. 717, 88 S. W. 1130.

And so it was held that no law of physics need be disregarded in accepting testimony that one's hand was forced a distance of 18 inches onto a saw as the result of a blow from a stick which had been caught in a revolving wheel; considering that such one was standing on the side of the table which carried the exposed saw and on a line with the wheels and a pile of waste, and that the stick declined from this pile towards the wheels, which were rapidly revolving, their rotary motion being towards the saw. (Mo.) Ibid.

So, also, in Phillips v. Southwest Missouri R. Co. (1913) 170 Mo. App. 416, 155 S. W. 470, the court stated that while it was willing to give full force and effect to the rule laid down to the effect that courts are not bound to give credence to the evidence of witnesses which is so opposed to natural law and the physical facts as to be manifestly false, yet it was not prepared to say that it is a physical impossibility for a heavy fender on a street car, in a sudden and violent fall, not stopping until the front end of it came within 7 inches of the ground, to so strike one with such force as to break his leg a few inches above the ankle.

And an impossible state of facts against natural laws is not shown by testimony that a man sixty-seven years of age, weighing 175 pounds, threw a man sixty-four years of age and weighing 165 pounds a distance of 7 feet, so as to warrant such testimony being disregarded as unworthy of belief. Peterson v. Liddington (1915) — Ind. App. —, 108 N. E. 977.

But testimony as to the quantity of water essential to the proper irrigation of lands will be disregarded although uncontroverted, where the absurdity of such testimony is manifest. Whited v. Cavin (1909) 55 Or. 98, 105 Pac. 396. It was claimed in this case that a flow of 17 inches of water per acre was necessary, but the court pointed out that 1 inch of water under 6-inch pressure miner's measurement is one fortieth of a second foot and furnishes a flow of 675 gallons per hour, which in thirty days would furnish  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acre feet or 6 acre feet of water for a four months' irrigation, and so a flow of 17 inches would cover an area equal to 1 acre to a depth of  $25\frac{1}{4}$  feet each month or 102 acre feet during an irrigation season of four months. And added that the quantity allowed by the government for irrigation season in similar localities and altitudes with like soil is usually about  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acre feet.

So, also, testimony that a certain wine is "Ohio claret wine" within the law and the definition of the food department will be disregarded where, to give it weight, the characteristics, distinctive, and predominant ingredients of the grape, tartaric acids, must be disregarded, which would take away the most obvious and convincing means of identifying a true claret wine. United States v. 60 Barrels of Wine (1915) 225 Fed. 846.

And that an engine and cars which left the tracks and smashed into and through the front fence and yard of certain premises, so jarred, shook, and moved the house that a woman sleeping in bed was thrown from her position thereon, over the foot thereof, which was 2 feet higher than the mattress, was held in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Chambers (1915) 165 Ky. 703, 178 S. W. 1041, to be inherently impossible, and so absolutely inconceivable that testimony to that effect could not be accepted as true, where the evidence was that neither the engine nor the car struck the house, and that, aside from the breaking of a pane of glass in the front door by a flying picket from the fence, nothing inside the house was disturbed, except that strings suspending a couple of pictures broke and the stovepipe became disconnected, and especially in view of the fact that other occupants of the dwelling were not thrown from their bed or seriously disturbed, and one was not even awakened.

It will not be declared as a matter of law to be a physical impossibility that a car could be started with such violence as to cause one alighting to lose her balance and be thrown down, and the car stopped within 2 or 3 feet. Zeiler v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1911) 153 Mo. App. 613, 34 S. W. 1067.

And in Elliott v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1911) 157 Mo. App. 517, 138 S. W. 663, it was held that testimony that a car started with such violence as to throw one into the rear vestibule, and stopped again within 2 or 3 feet, is not opposed by physical fact or law, citing Zeiler v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (Mo.) supra.

But testimony that a boy successfully boarded a freight train running at the speed of an express train, and that the train was brought to a dead stop within 10 feet, is so repugnant to the laws of physics of common knowledge that a reasonable mind must reject it as wholly impossible of belief. Giles v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 24, 154 S. W. 852.

Testimony that one alighting from a car, and, while her hand was still on the hand holds, was hurled to the pavement by a sudden jerking of the car, is not so opposed to natural law as to be incredible because of fact that she fell forward, and so tending to show that she must have negligently stepped from a moving car. Pickens v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1907) 125 Mo. App. 669, 103 S. W. 124. The court stated that the direction of her fall doubtless was influenced by three opposing forces,—the eastern motion she derived from the car, her southward motion in attempting to step from it, and the resistance offered by her attachment to the hand hold, which certainly could have greatly influenced the direction and nature of the fall. And the same doctrine was applied in Barnett v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1909) 138 Mo. App. 192, 120 S. W. 730.

And in Klass v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 617, 155 S. W. 57, action by passenger on street car for injuries alleged to have been caused by being thrown to the pavement as a result of a sudden starting of the car as she was alighting, there was testimony that, although the car was moving eastward, the injured passenger was thrown to the east; and it was contended that this testimony was physically impossible, as a person on the south side of an east-bound car, who is facing east and standing on the steps when the car stops, will invariably be thrown backwards towards the west as the car starts east again suddenly. The court in answering this contention said: "Of course we are not bound to give any consideration to the testimony of a witness that is repugnant to undisputed and indisputable physical facts and laws, but we do not regard the testimony of this witness as falling under that rule. Counsel for defendant assert that, in the position occupied by Mrs. Klass as described by the witness, the certain effect of a sudden forward start of the car would have been to throw her westward against the rear end of the vestibule, and not forward, but it must be borne in mind that several opposing and mutually modifying forces were brought into action, namely: First, the jerk of the car, which, if not interfered with, would have thrown the woman in the opposite direction; second, the force produced by the movement of Mrs. Klass in leaving the car, which at the time was exerted in a direction at right angles to that of the motion of the car; third, the resistance to the suddenly introduced force offered by the hand hold; and, fourth, the involuntary effort a person will make to retain his equilibrium under such circumstances. Obviously the direction given the falling body of a person who has some means and opportunity for resistance to the major force would vary in different instances, and would depend on the relative strength of the interacting forces. It would not do for us to indulge in a dogmatic conclusion, and to pronounce that to be impossible which not only is possible, but is well within the scope of the reasonable results of the forces brought into play. The question of whether or not the testimony of the witness is consistent with physical fact and law in this instance should be regarded as one of fact for the jury to determine."

But in Scroggins v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1909) 138 Mo. App. 215, 120 S. W. 731, testimony of one that as she was about to alight from a car, she having released her hand hold at the time she went to step, that she was thrown from the car head first in the direction the car was moving by a sudden starting of it, was held to be in opposition to the undisputed physical facts and laws of motion and physical forces as to not warrant relief. The court said: "How could the sudden starting of the car when she was in that position have the effect of throwing her head first in the direction in which the car was going; the natural result of such start would have been to jerk her feet towards the east and to pitch her body in the opposite direction; that would have been the effect produced on an inanimate body in her position, and the only modifying force that could have given a different direction to her fall would have been her subconscious efforts to counteract the sudden force exerted against her. Manifestly such involuntary but unsupported efforts could not have produced a counteracting force so pronounced as to overcome the impetus given her body by the starting of the car, and to pitch her body in a direction opposite to that it otherwise would have taken, and that, too, with a momentum so great to cause her to slide head first on the pavement in the direction the car was going. Her version of the occurrence is too unreasonable to pass muster. Clearly her fall was caused by her own negligence in attempting to alight from a rapidly moving car."

And following the Scroggins Case as authority, it was held in Daniels v. Kansas City Elev. R. Co. (1913) 177 Mo. App. 280, 164 S. W. 154, where one thrown from a car fell forward with the car, that testimony that, as he was boarding the car and before he could get his hand on the hand hold, he was thrown from the car by a sudden forward jerk, was contrary to natural law, and should not be credited.

In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Britton (1911) 111 C. C. A. 216, 190 Fed. 316, a female passenger on a railroad train who was seated on the left side of the car, facing the direction the train was going, and near the aisle, claimed that, because of the stopping of the train with a sudden jerk or jolt, she was thrown against the window sill and her left side and back injured. But the court, in reversing a judgment in her favor, said that, viewing her testimony in the most favorable light, she was not injured by being thrown, and was not thrown against the car window, but that she labored under an hallucination in that respect; that a sudden stopping of the train would have precipitated her forward, and not thrown her sideways some distance to the window; and, further, that sitting where she was, had she been suddenly thrown side ways against the window sill, she would not have been struck in the side and back below the ribs, but much higher up, at or about the shoulders.

But in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Morin (1906) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 144 S. W. 1191, action for injuries to one working in a car, alleged to be due to such car being struck by another car in process of switching, it was contended that in view of the testimony that the injured party was lying on some sacks while up in the east end of the car, against the east wall, with his head to the east, a little diagonally across the sacks, with his feet up against the south side of the car, his further testimony that he was thrown in a westerly direction was contrary to natural law, as the engine which struck his car came from the east. But the court said that, while it would not consider evidence that is in direct conflict with known and recognized natural or physical laws, yet, considering his position and the force of the jar, they could not say what effect the physical or natural law would have in such a contingency as to the manner in which he would be thrown, and so would not say that it should be disregarded.

Henkel v. Pioneer Sav. & L. Co., 61 Minn. 35, 63 N. W. 243.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff was the owner of certain real estate in Crow Wing county, Minnesota. April 15, 1907, he executed and delivered a deed, which was duly recorded, describing the land by its government description, but "reserving . . . all ores, mines, minerals, fossils, mineral oils, and mineral paints which may be in or upon said lands, with the privilege of searching, digging, boring, shafting, and mining therefor on any and every part of the said premises . . . together also with the right of building, maintaining as long as needed, and removing when not needed, any buildings, structures, etc., needed for such mining operations." There was a provision for the payment of damages to any buildings of the grantee, or injury to the soil for cultivation, caused by any mining operations.

Plaintiff brought this action to determine adverse claims to the interest reserved by him in the deed. Admittedly he still owns this interest unless his title was devested by the sale of the land to the state for the taxes of 1907, and the expiration of the time for redemption. Defendant is the owner of this tax title, through assignment from the state, and claimed to have acquired thereby the title of plaintiff to the mineral rights reserved by the deed. The decision of the trial court was that plaintiff was the owner of these mineral rights. Judgment was entered accordingly, and defendant appealed.

The question involved is whether the tax proceedings, in which the land was described by its government description, without in terms including or excluding the mineral rights held by another than the owner of the surface, operated to assess and levy a tax upon such mineral rights, and to convey such rights to the purchaser at the tax sale.

If the tax was assessed and levied upon the entire land, including the mineral rights, and if the taxing officers might legally so assess and tax together the surface and mineral rights, the irregularity in not taxing separately the interests of the different owners did not affect the jurisdiction of the court in the tax proceedings. Under our statutes the true ownership of lands sought to be charged by tax proceedings is not material. McQuade v. Jaffray, 47 Minn. 326, 50 N. W. 233; Minneapolis R. Terminal Co. v. Minnesota Debenture Co. 81 Minn. 66, 83 N. W. 485; Ballard v. Hunter, 204 U. S. 241, 51 L. ed. 461, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261. As stated in the Ballard Case (p. 258) with reference to the statutes of Arkansas, our statutes "virtually make the land a party to the suit to collect the taxes. It is from the lands alone, and not from their owner, that the taxes are to be satisfied." In the Minnesota Debenture Co. Case, land consisting of two distinct parcels with different owners was assessed, taxed, proceeded against, and sold as one parcel. It was held that this might have been a defense if presented when application for judgment was made, but that the owner or owners of the land were concluded by the judgment in the tax proceedings.

If, however, the description of the property in the tax proceedings and certificate covered only the estate of the owner of the surface, and not that of the owner of the mineral rights, the taxes were not a lien upon the estate of the latter, and the judgment did not attach to or the certificate convey such interest.

It is well settled in this state, as elsewhere, that the owner of land may segregate the mineral estate from the rest of the land, and convey either interest without the other. It is also clear that the reservation in this case was valid. Carlson v. Minnesota Land & Colonization Co. 113 Minn. 361, 129 N. W. 768; Buck v. Walker, 115 Minn. 239, 132 N. W. 205, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 882. As stated by Chief Justice Start in the Buck Case: "Contracts excepting ores and minerals from grants of land, with a reservation of the right to enter upon the portion thereof granted, are in accordance with long-established usage, and have been invariably held by the courts to be valid." As stated by Mr. Justice Lewis in the Carlson Case: "The owner may convey any part of real estate. He may convey some particular deposit or stratum and retain the surface, or he may convey a part or all of the mineral strata or deposits and retain the surface. Such strata or deposits are land." There is no dissent from the proposition that such an interest so created or reserved is land, whatever may be the case under leases or other contracts under which the right to mine is granted for a fixed term. "The minerals and the surface interests may, by separate conveyance, become separate pieces of real estate, and held by different persons, and each estate may be separately seized and sold by execution, and each may be defeated by the statute of limitations as any other real estate. See Kincaid v. McGowan, 88 Ky. 91, 13 L.R.A. 289, 4 S. W. 802, where the matter is fully discussed. The mineral estate, when severed by conveyance, being separate real estate, may be taxed as other real estate." Stuart v. Com. 94 Ky. 595, 23 S. W. 367. That mines may form a distinct possession and a different inheritance L.R.A.1916D.

from the surface lands was the settled law in England and in this country long before the enactment of any statute on the subject. Caldwell v. Copeland, 37 Pa. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436, 1 Mor. Min. Rep. 189. It would seem to follow logically that the mineral estate, being land, is taxable separately from the surface, when the owners are different, just as when the owner of a tract of land conveys a part of it to another the parcel of each is taxable separately. And that this is the law, even in the absence of statute, there can be no doubt. 37 Cyc. 775, and cases cited in note 64; note to Wolfe County v. Beckett, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 688.

Many of the authorities cited, notably the Pennsylvania and Illinois cases, hold that where there is a divided ownership there must be a divided taxation. The statutes of several states provide that the interests in such cases shall be separately taxed. We do not, however, refer to these cases for the purpose of supporting the view that prior to the enactment of chapter 161, p. 196, Laws 1905, a separate assessment and taxation was obligatory in the sense that an attempt to tax the two interests together would necessarily make a judgment void on collateral attack. We place emphasis on the state of the law at the time this statute was enacted as an aid in ascertaining the object of the legislature. Chapter 161, p. 196, Laws 1905, in force at the time of the assessment and levy in question, and now Gen. Stat. 1913, § 1973, reads as follows: "That whenever any mineral, gas, coal, oil, or other similar interests in real estate are owned separately and apart from and independently of the rights and interests owned in the surface of such real estate, such mineral, gas, coal, oil, or other similar interests may be assessed and taxed separately from such surface rights and interests in said real estate, and may be sold for taxes in the same manner and with the same effect as other interests . . . are sold for taxes."

As we have stated, it was the unquestioned law, at the time this statute was passed, that mineral interests in real estate owned separately and apart from interests in the surface were real estate and might be assessed and taxed separately from the surface interests, and "sold for taxes in the same manner and with the same effect as other interests in real estate are sold for taxes." Before the statute, it was not only proper to tax the mineral interest separately, but it was plainly an irregularity to assess to one owner as one property both the surface and the mineral rights, when they were owned separately. The legislature must be credited with some object in passing the law. Whether this object was to make it obligatory to assess and tax mineral rights separately from the interest in the surface, or whether it was to declare and make clearer the already clear common law on the subject, may be open to doubt; but in either case there is a statutory direction to the taxing officers how to proceed when the interests are owned separately. It is not necessary to hold, as we view the case, that under this statute an assessment and tax against both interests together is fatal to the jurisdiction of the court to render a judgment, and that therefore the owner of either interest who has failed to defend in the proceedings can attack the judgment collaterally. But it was the duty of the taxing officers, under the statute, as well as under the common law, to assess and tax separately the interests of plaintiff and those of the owner of the surface. The deed separating the mineral rights from the surface rights was of record at the time the tax was levied and became a lien. It is to be presumed that the taxing officers intended to follow the law. These considerations are helpful in reaching a decision whether the description of the property used in the tax proceedings includes the mineral rights. It contains no mention of any such right or interest. Manifestly it would have been easy to have described the property taxed as "mineral rights," as it would have been to describe it as "surface rights." The description used does neither, but is merely the government description. The interest of plaintiff in the minerals was plainly real estate, and properly taxable separately. The law directed the assessing officers to tax it separately. If the separate interest of the mineral owner is covered by this description, the result is that his property is taxed without notice to him, under the guise of taxing the property of another. The courts do not favor such a result. In Eastman v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. 43 Minn. 60, 44 N. W. 882, the question was as to what land was included in the description used in the tax proceedings. Mr. Justice Vanderburgh said: "The title of each party being of record, it will not be presumed that the separate property of different parties is embraced under one general description in tax proceedings, if the same may be applied and limited to the land of one, and not to that of the other. The description, when applied to the subject-matter, . . . is susceptible of the construction claimed for it by the defendant. An opposite construction would be misleading, . . . and ought not therefore to be upheld." This language seems particularly appropriate here. The description in the case at bar when applied to the subject-matter, and viewed in the light of the facts and the law as they existed at the time the tax was levied, is fairly susceptible of the construction claimed for it by the plaintiff and adopted by the learned trial court. We therefore decide that the mineral or mineral rights of plaintiff were not covered by the description in the tax proceedings, and were not taxed in those proceedings.

It does not seem important that the mineral estate may have escaped taxation. That the assessor omitted to assess this interest does not influence the decision in the present case. Nor do we regard as vital the fact that there may be difficulties in arriving at the true value of mineral rights. There is nothing whatever in the law or in this opinion that in any way tends to permit the owner of a separate mineral estate to escape paying taxes on his property.

We fully appreciate that in Minnesota the tax is upon the land, and that its ownership is not the material thing. But it is nevertheless true that the land of one person should not pay the taxes that ought properly to be paid by the land of another. The judgment in the tax proceedings does not affect the mineral estate of plaintiff, because that estate was not described in the proceedings. We do not hold that defendant's tax title is void, but simply that it does not cover the "land" of plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Annotation—Interest of other than the owner of the soil in mineral in situ as independent subject of taxation.

The present note supplements that to Wolfe County v. Beckett, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 688. These notes are limited strictly to the question indicated in the title, and do not include cases dealing with the taxability of mining claims on public lands, or with the taxation of mines as such, or the proceeds of mines.

Land may be divided horizontally as L.R.A.1916D.

well as vertically; one may own the surface and another the minerals underground, and each estate be subject to taxation. Greene County v. Lattas Creek Coal Co. (1913) 179 Ind. 212, 100 N. E. 561; Northern P. R. Co. v. Mjelde (1913) 48 Mont. 287, 137 Pac. 386.

The principle stated in the earlier note that, when, by an instrument in proper form, the fee in the mineral is severed from the fee in the surface, each fee or interest is separately assessable and taxable to the owner thereof as real estate, is sustained also by Cherokee & P. Coal & Min. Co. v. Crawford County (1905) 71 Kan. 276, 80 Pac. 601; State v. Downman (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 787, and other cases subsequently cited in this note.

This principle has received the sanction of the United States Supreme Court as against an objection based upon the guaranty of the equal protection of the laws by the 14th Amendment. Thus, the assessment for taxing purposes of mineral rights where they have been separately conveyed and are owned by persons other than the owners of the surface estates, without any corresponding deduction from the assessments against the surface owners, does not violate U. S. Const. 14th Amendment as discriminating against the owners of the mineral rights so assessed, where it does not appear that mineral rights known to exist were consciously relieved from taxation if they belonged to the owners of the surface. Downman v. Texas (1913) 231 U. S. 353, 58 L. ed. 264, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62.

But the guaranty of the equal protection of the laws by the state and Federal Constitution was held, in State ex rel. Owen v. Donald (1915) 161 Wis. 188, 153 N. W. 238, to be violated by the provisions of the Wisconsin statute (Laws 1913, chap. 367) in relation to the separate taxation of rights and reservations in respect of minerals, which restrict the purchasers in case of the sale of such rights or reservations for non-payment of taxes to the state and the owner of the fee to which the right or reservation is attached. From the concurring opinion of Timlin, J., it would appear that this decision was rendered upon the express assumption that the statute should be taken to include exceptions and grants of ores or minerals as well as reservations of the right to take away ores and minerals. The court observed that treating this statute, as it must be treated, as a taxing statute, the purpose of which is to raise money, the limitation of the bidders is not germane to, but in contravention of, that purpose. Another reason for holding the statute unconstitutional was that the provisions for the state advancing money to the county on account of the sales of such property, in connection with the provision that the owner of the remaining interest may redeem within three years, L.R.A.1916D.

or, in many cases, within a longer period, amounted in practical effect to the state advancing money to the favored person, who had an option to repay the state the amount advanced, with interest, and take the property or let the state keep the same. Winslow, Ch. J., and Siebecker and Kerwin, JJ., dissented upon the ground that a mining right is a property right of such a markedly different character from that of other forms of property that it may properly be the subject of classification, provided the uniformity rule of taxation be not violated.

A statute which provides that where the surface of land is held by one person and the minerals by another, the commissioner shall ascertain the fair market value of their respective interests, makes the two holdings distinct and separate subjects of taxation. Tiller v. Excelsior Coal & Lumber Corp. (1909) 110 Va. 151, 65 S. E. 507.

It is the duty of taxing officers to assess and tax separately the interests of a grantor and grantee in a conveyance describing the land by its government description "but reserving . . . all ores, mines, minerals, fossils, mineral oils, and mineral paints which may be in or upon said lands," under the common law as well as under the Minnesota statute, which expressly provides for such separate assessment. WASHBURN v. GREGORY Co. ante, 304.

The decision in WASHBURN v. GREGORY Co. was followed by Tyndall v. Du Bois (1914) 125 Minn. 536, 147 N. W. 708.

In Riggs v. Sullivan County (1914) 181 Ind. 172, 103 N. E. 1075, the court declared that mining interests in mineral are the subject of horizontal severance from the surface, and taxable as real estate; and held, or at least assumed, that such severance brought into operation the statute declaring that whenever a division or partition has been made, or other changes take place in the ownership of any tract or lot of land or any part thereof by conveyance, sale, devise, or descent, the county auditor shall transfer the same on the last appraisal list, and apportion the same and the valuation thereof, with all delinquent taxes, to the several owners.

The right or interest embodied in a reservation in a conveyance to the grantor, his successors, and assigns of all mineral upon or in the land conveyed, constitutes an interest in real estate, subject to taxation as such, and is neither a mine nor a mining claim within art. XII. § 3, of the Constitution, providing in effect for the taxation of the annual net proceeds of all mines and mining claims. Northern P. R. Co. v. Mjelde, (1913) 48 Mont. 287, 137 Pac. 386.

An instrument in form similar to an ordinary conveyance of real estate, and containing all the requisites essential to deeds of conveyance of real property, purporting to grant and convey all metals and ores "in place or severed from the earth, which might or could be worked for profit by underground excavation or open workings, or both," conveys interests in land which are subject to taxation separate from the land itself; and it is not incumbent upon the state to show that the lands described in the instrument contained any mineral ores or valuable substances, the burden being upon the owner of such interest to show that the lands do not contain such minerals. State v. Downman (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 787. The judgment in this case was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in (1913) 231 U. S. 353, 58 L. ed. 264, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62. The Supreme Court, however, did not pass independently upon the proposition above stated, but merely held that it did not involve a violation of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

The interest under a conveyance of the "coal and other minerals" underlying a prescribed tract of land, though no coal or other mineral was ever mined from the tract, was held in Greene County v. Lattas Creek Coal Co. (1913) 179 Ind. 212, 100 N. E. 561, to be subject to taxation under the statute declaring that "all lands" within the state are subject to taxation. This reverses the decision of the Indiana appellate court (1911) — Ind. App. —, 96 N. E. 633, holding that the assessment of the coal and other minerals was invalid for the reason that they were not within the meaning of the term "mine or quarry" in the section of the statute providing that, in valuing any real property in which there is a mine or quarry which is owned by a person other than the owner of the surface of the lands, the mine or quarry shall be separately valued and assessed to the respective owners. The supreme court held that the fact that the interest was under ground would not exclude it from the general statute above referred to.

The Kansas statute which provides for the assessment and taxation of minerals in the earth when the ownership of them is in one person and the fee of the surface of the land is in another should be construed as part of the general tax law L.R.A.1916D.

of the state, and thus be supplied with provisions for its enforcement. Cherokee & P. Coal & Min. Co. v. Crawford County (1905) 71 Kan. 276, 80 Pac. 601.

In Rockwell v. Warren County (1910) 228 Pa. 430, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1006, 77 Atl. 665, affirming (1909) 39 Pa. Super. Ct. 468, the supreme court repudiated the attempted distinction between seated and unseated land in respect to the severability of estates in the surface and the oil, gas, and coal or other minerals underlying the surface, and held that the oil, gas, and minerals reserved from the grant of the surface of tracts of unseated land are the subjects of separate taxation as real estate.

A novel question was presented in McCormick v. Berkey (1913) 238 Pa. 264, 86 Atl. 97. The owner of a tract of 245 acres conveyed 192 acres thereof, reserving to the grantor all the minerals underlying the same; subsequently the grantor executed a deed purporting to convey to a third person the entire tract of 245 acres, reserving and excepting the 192 acres previously conveyed; the 53 acres and the minerals underlying the 192 acres were assessed separately, the former as seated, and the latter as unseated, lands; and the latter was sold as unseated lands for the nonpayment of taxes due from the original grantor for years subsequent to the conveyance. It was held that the original deed worked a severance of the minerals laterally and of the surface rights in the 192-acre tract, but did not have the effect to sever perpendicularly the minerals underlying the 192-acre tract from the remaining part of the 245-acre tract, and there was no authority to assess or sell the mineral right underlying the 192 acres as unseated land distinct and separate from the 53-acre tract. The court said that it is the duty of the taxing officers to assess the entire adjacent real estate holding of the owner, not severed or detached by his own act as a single body, and they have no authority to divide them and assess them severally for the purposes of taxation; this rule applies where a tract of land has been assessed as a whole and part of the surface or minerals has been sold. The court further said that the assessment of the 53-acre tract was the assessment of the surface and all the minerals, and the taxes paid under such assessment were the taxes on the whole body of land.

Under the Michigan statute providing that in determining the value of real estate for the purposes of taxation, the assessors shall consider the "quantity and value of standing timber, water power, and privileges, mines, minerals, quarries, or other valuable deposits known to be available there, and their value," it is held in effect in Curry v. Lake Superior Iron Co. (1916) — Mich. —, 157 N. W. 19, that all estates in any particular description of land must be assessed together. The ultimate question in that case, whether the owner of the mineral right could obtain and hold a tax title as against the owner of the surface, is not within the scope of this annotation.

As shown in the earlier note, if the instrument by which the right to the mineral is created is, when properly construed, a mere lease or license, and does not dis sever the fee in the mineral from the fee in soil or surface, while it may by virtue of a local statute be taxable as personal property, it is not ordinarily taxable as real property.

The court in Rockwell v. Warren County (Pa.) supra, clearly observes the distinction between the grant or reservation of coal, oil, or gas in place, and a mere license to mine the coal or to drill for oil and gas, unaccompanied by the right of ownership in the minerals underlying the surface, and declares that the freehold constitutes an estate in land taxable as such, but the latter does not.

It is apparent, however, that the term "real estate" for the purposes of taxation may be so defined by statute as to cover the interest in mineral even in a lease which does not sever the fee of the mineral from the surface.

Thus, the rights of a holder of an oil lease may be taxed separately from those of the owner of the fee, under a statute providing that the term "real estate" shall include all mines and minerals in and under land and all rights and privileges pertaining thereto. Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara County (1909) 155 Cal. 144, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 211, 99 Pac. 483. It was so held notwithstanding that the lease in question was construed to vest in the lessee merely an estate for years, so far as necessary for the purpose of taking oil therefrom, and did not create an absolute present title to the oil strata in place. The court observed that an absolute estate in underlying strata may be created, and the estate of the owner of the overlying land and of the owner of the subterranean stratum will be as distinct and separate as is the ownership of respective owners of two adjoining tracts of land; adding that for the purposes of separate ownership land may be divided horizontally as well as superficially and vertically. As shown, L.R.A. 1916D.

however, the court held that the rights under the lease were within the statute, notwithstanding that the lease did not sever the estates in the surface and the subterranean stratum. The fact that this condition was not created by the lease in question was not regarded as excluding it from the operation of the statute providing for separate taxation.

Oil and gas.

See also cases cited in note in 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 688; and Rockwell v. Warren County (Pa.) and Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara County (Cal.) supra.

The question whether the fee in oil and gas may, like the fee in solid mineral, be severed from the fee in the surface, is not within the scope of these notes, except so far as it has arisen in taxation cases.

For the purpose of ownership and conveyance of solid minerals, the earth may be divided horizontally as well as vertically, and title to the surface may rest in one person, and title to the strata beneath the surface containing such minerals in another; and the same principle applies to oil and gas. Texas Co. v. Daugherty (1915) — Tex. —, L.R.A. —, —, 176 S. W. 717. The court, after an extended discussion, repudiated the attempted distinction between oil and gas and solid minerals as subjects of distinct interests in real property.

"Oil leases," so-called, which purported to grant, bargain, sell, and convey all the oil, gas, coal, and other minerals in and under a particular tract of land; habendum: "To have and to hold . . . the above-described premises, rights, properties, and privileges, . . . under the said grantee, and the heirs, successors, and assigns of such, forever, upon the following terms," under penalty of forfeiture of "the rights and estates hereby granted" in certain contingencies,—were held in Texas Co. v. Daugherty (Tex.) supra, to constitute a grant of a defeasible title in fee to the oil and gas in the ground, and so separately taxable to the grantee as an interest in real property. The decision, as noted, was made to turn upon the character of the instrument of conveyance as distinguished from the mere grant of a license or privilege. In that respect the opinion of the supreme court differs from that of the Texas court of civil appeals ((1913) 160 S. W. 129), whose judgment in this case was affirmed, as the latter court deemed it unnecessary to determine whether the leases in controversy, when tested by the common law, conveyed any title to the oil or gas beneath the surface, as in any event the interest created would be subject to taxation under the provision of the statute that real property, for the purposes of taxation, should be construed to include the land and all the rights and privileges belonging to it or in any wise appertaining thereto.

The right under "an oil and gas lease, so-called, which purports to grant to one and his heirs all the oil and gas in and under" the described premises, was held in People ex rel. Carrell v. Bell (1908) 237 Ill. 332, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 746, 86 N. E. 593, 15 Ann. Cas. 511, to convey a freehold interest, and to be taxable as an interest in real property, under a statute declaring that any mining right or right to dig for or obtain iron, lead, copper, coal, or other mineral from land, may be conveyed by deed or lease; and when the owner of any land shall convey, by deed or lease, any mining right therein, such conveyance shall be considered as so separating such right from the land that the same shall be taxable as real estate.

But oil and gas, while lying in a strata of earth, constitute a sort of ferre naturæ, which, if taxed at all prior to being reduced to possession, must be taxed as real property to the owner of the land under which for the time being they may lie, and cannot be taxed against one who has a mere lease or license to go upon the premises, search for, and, if found, take them away. In Re Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Co. (1914) 43 Okla. 307, 142 Pac. 997. It will be observed that the hypothesis of this proposition does not include a case where the fee of the oil or gas is severed from the fee of the soil.

Where the petroleum, gas, etc., underlying a tract of land was conveyed by a deed wherein the grantee covenanted for himself, his successors, grantees, and assigns to pay all taxes assessed upon "said premises," and the company that succeeded to the title of the grantee had physical and visible occupancy of the surface of the real estate over the entire tract, it was held liable for all taxes assessed against the premises whether for surface or for minerals; it appearing that the words, "said premises," were used by the parties in their deed in four places, and in each place referred to the whole property; that is, the surface, oil, gas, and minerals. Potter Gas Co. v. Dunshie (1910) 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 457.

Master and servant — explosion of missed shot in quarry — negligence of employer.

1. That a common laborer in a stone quarry was not at the place where he was assigned to work at the time he was injured by the explosion of a missed shot will not prevent his holding the master liable for the injury if he was not directed to work in any one spot, nor warned or forbidden to go to the place where the exin plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. L. Woods and John M. Theobald for appellant.

Messrs. James Clay and E. Hogge for appellee.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Chesapeake Stone Company, was engaged in operating a stone quarry, and in the conduct of its work it used charges of dynamite, fired by caps and fuse. The appellee, Holbrook, while engaged at work as a day laborer for the company in its quarry, was permanently and seriously injured by the explosion of a stick of dynamite left in a rock at the place where he was working by other servants of the company who had charge of the blasting in its quarry.

It appears that a few days before appellee received the injuries complained of eight or nine holes about 18 inches deep and confined to a small space were drilled for the purpose of putting in them the dynamite, and that after these holes were drilled, McCoy, an employee of the company, loaded them with sticks of dynamite prepared with caps and fuse, for the purpose of blasting; that McCoy attempted to set off all these charges of dynamite at one time, and doubtless thought he had done so, but the dynamite in one of the holes did not explode. Some days after this the appellee was working in company with a collaborer named Henderson, in the rock where the dynamite had been placed, and Henderson, who was using a pick in the course of his work, happened to strike with the pick the unexploded charge of dynamite, causing it to explode, with the result that Henderson was immediately killed and the appellee seriously and permanently injured. In this suit to recover damages for the injuries so sustained the appellee had a judgment for a moderate sum, and the stone company appeals.

Counsel for the company devote some part of their argument to an effort to show that appellee was not working at the place he was assigned to work, and that Henderson was not doing the things that he had been directed to do. But we do not find any merit in either of these contentions. Appellee was employed as a common laborer. He was not directed to work in any spot in the quarry, nor was he warned or forbidden to go to or about the place where he was when the explosion occurred. Under these circumstances, and being ignorant of the presence of the dynamite, he had a right to assume that it would be safe for him to go in and about the quarry at any place near the place at which he was assigned to work. It may also be said that Henderson, when he struck this charge of dynamite, was performing service in the course of his employment, and, of course, did not suspect that unexploded dynamite was in the rock at the place he was working.

It is further suggested by counsel that this dynamite which exploded may have been put there by some person other than McCoy, or by some person not connected with the company; but this suggestion is entirely unsupported by any fact or circumstance shown in the record. In fact, we think there can be no reasonable doubt that the dynamite that exploded had been placed in one of the holes by McCoy, but for some unexplained reason did not explode when he attempted to fire off these several charges. It may be true that McCoy thought all the dynamite had been exploded, and it may also be true that the dynamite that did explode covered the premises with rock and dirt to such an extent that it could not be told by an ordinary inspection that one charge had not been exploded; but these circumstances do not excuse the company from liability.

It does not appear that any careful inspection of the premises after the explosion by McCoy was made for the purpose of ascertaining whether it had all exploded. There was only what may be called a casual inspection or examination. McCoy says that he believed all the charges had exploded, and that the debris prevented him from telling with certainty whether they had or not, but he did not make, nor did anyone else, any careful inspection for the purpose of determining whether all of the charges had exploded. In work like this the stone company was under a duty to exercise ordinary care to furnish appellee a reasonably safe place in which to work, and, considering the dangerous nature of dynamite and the fact that the company knew it had been put a few days before at the place where Henderson and appellee were working, this duty imposed upon it the further duty of making a very careful examination after the explosion by McCoy to ascertain whether or not all of the charges of dynamite had exploded. And this duty it did not perform, nor did it warn Henderson or appellee of the probable presence of the dynamite.

Dynamite is an inherently dangerous agency, and persons who use it must exercise care corresponding with the danger. When dynamite in the course of work is put in holes for the purpose of being exploded, and is attempted to be exploded, the master must make a very careful examination for the purpose of ascertaining whether all the charges have exploded before he sends other men to work at this place with implements that might cause an explosion by coming in contact with any charge that had not exploded. What kind of an inspection he should make, or what efforts he should resort to, or what methods he should use, for the purpose of definitely ascertaining whether the dynamite has been exploded or not, are questions that must be settled according to the nature and circumstances of the surrounding conditions. But whatever effort or whatever method or whatever inspection is resorted to, it must be sufficient to meet the high degree of care exacted; and this degree of care is the highest degree of care practicable under the surrounding conditions.

We had before us in Harp v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2133, 80 S. W. 510, a case something like this. In that case Harp was employed by the telephone company in the work of digging post holes, and when he went to work to complete the digging of a hole that had been partially made the day before by other servants of the company, some dynamite that had been left in the hole by other servants exploded, causing the injuries of which he complained. In discussing the duty and liability of the telephone company the court said: "As has been repeatedly held by this court, it is the duty of the employer to supply the servant with reasonably safe and suitable tools and machinery to perform the work required of him, and equally his duty to furnish him a reasonably safe place to work, and to see that it is kept so. . . . The appellant had the right to assume that the foregoing rule would be observed by the foreman and other servants of appellee on the occasion of receiving his injuries, and it was their duty to know that there was dynamite in the hole in which he was ordered to dig, and to remove it, or warn him of its presence in time to have prevented his injuries. It is manifest from the evidence that some of the appellee's servants then present did know that there was dynamite in the hole, for they had a few days previously left it there, and further manifest that appellant did not know it was there. It could not be seen because covered by both mud and water. It matters not that it was left in the hole by a fellow servant of appellant, as the negligence of such servant was and is imputable in such a case to the appellee as master."

In Cincinnati N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Padgett, 158 Ky. 301, 164 S. W. 971, Padgett was injured by the explosion of a stick of dynamite that had been placed in a bucket of pitch. In stating the duty of persons using the dynamite, the court said: "It is the duty of persons who keep in their possession or employ in their business that which, unless carefully guarded and cautiously used, is dangerous to others, to exercise such care to see that the dangerous agency is so kept and used as not to inflict injury upon others, as an ordinarily prudent person would be expected to exercise in the use and keeping of such dangerous agency."

In Jobe v. Spokane Gas & Fuel Co. 73 Wash. 1, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 931, 131 Pac. 235, the court, in setting out the duty and liability the master is under to protect his servant from injury caused by the presence of powder that had not exploded, said: "In the employment of inherently dangerous agencies, such as powder or other explosives, it is the duty of the master to exercise a degree of care for the safety of the servant commensurate with the danger reasonably to be anticipated."

In Blaisdell v. Davis Paper Co. 75 N. H. 497, 139 Am. St. Rep. 735, 77 Atl. 485, in discussing the duty of the master in a case like this, the court said: "In view of the extreme hazard which would be created by the presence of such an explosive in ground which a gang of men were removing with pick and shovel, it cannot be said as matter of law that it was not the master's duty to use every precaution human ingenuity could suggest, or else warn the workmen of the danger."

And in Mather v. Rillston, 156 U. S. 391, 39 L. ed. 464, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 464, 18 Mor. Min. Rep. 165, the Supreme Court used this strong language: "Indeed, we think it may be laid down as a legal principle that in all occupations which are attended with great and unusual danger there must be used all appliances readily attainable known to science for the prevention of accidents, and that the neglect to provide such readily attainable appliances will be regarded as proof of culpable negligence. If an occupation attended with danger can be prosecuted by proper precautions without fatal results, such precautions must be taken by the promoters of the pursuit or employers of laborers thereon. Liability for injuries following a disregard of such precautions will otherwise be incurred, and this fact should not be lost sight of. So, too, if persons engaged in dangerous occupations are not informed of the accompanying dangers by the promoters thereof, or by the employers of laborers thereon, and such laborers remain in ignorance of the dangers and suffer in consequence, the employers will also be chargeable for the injuries sustained."

In the case we have the court told the jury, in substance, that it was the duty of the defendant to furnish the plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which to work and to see that it was kept so, and that, if the defendant knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the presence of the dynamite at the place at which he was directed to work, it was its duty to remove the same or warn him of its presence in time to have prevented the injury. This instruction is complained of, but we think it was too favorable to the company. It did not impose on it the high degree of care required to be exercised under the circumstances. The jury should have been told that it was the duty of the company to exercise the highest degree of care practicable under the existing conditions for the purpose of discovering whether any of the dynamite had been left unexploded, and if it knew, or by the exercise of this degree of care could have known, of the presence of the dynamite, it was its duty to remove the cause of the danger or warn appellee of the danger.

This suit was brought against the Chesapeake Stone Company and the Highland Stone Company. The petition charged that the Highland Stone Company was a corporation created under the forms of law for the sole purpose of aiding and assisting the Chesapeake Stone Company to escape liability for injuries that might happen to its servants working in the quarry; that the Highland Stone Company was an insolvent, irresponsible concern, while the Chesapeake Stone Company, the real owner and operator of the business, was solvent and responsible, but was using the name of the Highland Stone Company as the operator of the quarry in a fraudulent effort to protect itself from suits growing out of the operation of the quarry by it, and judgment was sought against each of the companies. It is right hard to tell from the evidence which of these companies was the real owner and operator of the quarry. Both of them appear to have been owned by the same people, and both of them figure in more or less degree in the operations of the quarry. There was evidence that appellee and other employees were paid by checks of the Highland Stone Company, and there was also evidence that the foreman who employed appellee employed him to work for the Highland Company. It was further shown that the name of the Chesapeake Stone Company was printed or marked on the crusher used by the company. And the evidence of one W. B. Whitt throws a good deal of light on the connection of these companies in the operation of the quarry, which connection it was apparently the purpose of the officers to conceal. Whitt testified that at one time he was the owner of practically all of the stock of the Chesapeake Stone Company, which then owned and operated the quarry, and that for the purpose of protecting it and the stockholders from suits and liability he organized the Highland Stone Company with a capital stock of $500; that it was organized solely for this purpose, and that, pursuant to it, it leased the quarry from the Chesapeake Stone Company at a rental so high that it would be impossible for the Highland Stone Company to ever make any profit; that after operating the quarry this way for a few years he sold both companies to Ireland & Francis, who owned them at the time appellee was injured, telling them at the time of the sale why the Highland Stone Company had been organized and how the business between it and the Chesapeake Stone Company was conducted. This witness also said that about the time appellee was injured he purchased from the Chesapeake Stone Company a lot of crushed stone manufactured at this quarry and paid this company for it, and also purchased from it dynamite for which he paid it.

It is complained that this evidence was not competent, but we think it was. In the absence of any other evidence to the contrary, it is fair to assume that Ireland & Francis were using the Highland Company for the purpose that Whitt had used it, and that the Chesapeake Company was the real owner and operator of the quarry. The appellee sued both of these companies, and, not having in his possession the facts or the records showing their relation, he had the right to show by such facts and circumstances as were available to him the business relations between them and which one of them was, in truth, the owner and operator of the quarry. The officers of these companies, of course, knew whether the companies, were operating the quarry jointly, or, if one of them was operating it, which one. They also knew the relation these companies sustained toward each other, and, if only one of them was liable for injuries suffered by employees in the quarry, which one of them it was. But, curiously enough, not one of the officers of either of these companies was offered as a witness, nor was any evidence introduced in behalf of either of the companies showing their relation to each other, or which one of them was, in fact, the owner of or operating the quarry.

Under the circumstances related, we think there was sufficient evidence to authorize the jury to find, as they did, against the Chesapeake Stone Company alone.

The stockholders of a solvent corporation will not be allowed to incorporate a dummy corporation for the sole purpose of trying to protect the solvent corporation from suits and damages in the operation of the work in which it is engaged; and, when a person has a cause of action arising either in contract or tort against corporations conducting their business in this way, he may sue both of them, and if the evidence is sufficient, recover against the solvent corporation, although his contract was made with the dummy, and it was apparently in control of the work in which the employee was injured. The question as to which one of these companies was the real owner and operator of the quarry was submitted to the jury in an instruction telling them, in substance, that if they believed from the evidence that the Highland Stone Company was not operating the property in good faith, but solely for the purpose of permitting the Chesapeake Stone Company to escape liability for plaintiff's injuries, they should find against the Chesapeake Stone Company alone, but if they believed that the Highland Stone Company was the real owner and operator of the quarry, they should find against it alone. Under this instruction the jury found against the Chesapeake Stone Company alone, and we think the evidence warranted such a finding.

There is some criticism of the instructions, but we think it is not well founded. It is also said that Henderson and the appellee were fellow servants, and the jury should have been instructed on this issue. We do not think so. These men were not fellow servants in the sense that the company was not responsible for injuries to one caused by the act of the other. The failure of the company to exercise the degree of care required of it caused, not only the death of Henderson, but the injury to appellee, and under no view of the case that we can think of should the company be excused for the injuries inflicted upon appellee.

It is further urged that it was error to permit Clarence Henderson, a witness for appellee, to relate a conversation with Will McCoy shortly after the accident, in which McCoy, as Henderson testified, said: "We knew that dynamite was there. It was in that lot of shots that was put there a week ago."

This evidence was not competent, but neither did it prejudice the substantial rights of the appellant. The evidence showed conclusively that the dynamite had been put there by McCoy, and, whether he or the company knew it was there or not at the time of the accident, it is very clear that the required degree of care was not exercised to discover its presence. Not having exercised the requisite care, the situation is virtually the same as if it had known the dynamite was there and failed to warn the employees of its presence.

Upon the whole record, we think the appellant had a fair trial, and that the judgment against it was authorized by the law and evidence. Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

F. E. CURTICE, Appt.,
v.

CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAIL-WAY COMPANY, Resp't.

(— Wis. —, 156 N. W. 484.)

Limitation of actions — amendment of action for injury to show interstate character of transaction.

The amendment of a complaint seeking damages for injury to a railroad employee, so as to show that at the time of the injury the railroad was an interstate railroad, and that the injury occurred in interstate commerce so as to come within the operation of the Federal employers' liability act, does not, although there was nothing in the original complaint to show that relief was not sought under the state law, as plaintiff's counsel claimed the intent to be, constitute a new cause of action so as to be affected by the statute of limitations, if the original action was brought in time. For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, IV. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(Barnes and Vinje, JJ., dissent.)

(February 22, 1916.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County dismissing a complaint filed to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servants. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This action was brought to recover for personal injuries. The original complaint, omitting the title, was as follows:

"First. That the defendant is a railway corporation organized under the laws of the state of Wisconsin; that at all times herein mentioned, it owned and operated a line of railway in and through said state, and between the cities of Marinette and Green Bay, Wisconsin.

"Second. That at all times hereinafter stated, when injured, plaintiff, a resident of said city of Green Bay, was in the employ and service of defendant as a freight conductor on one of defendant's freight trains operating between said cities; that on the 9th day of October, 1911, while running southerly, and about to head in onto the siding at Little Suamico, a station on said line in Oconto county, the defendant's said freight on which plaintiff then was employed as conductor was carelessly and negligently run into by one of defendant's passenger trains following after, before the freight had time to pull onto the siding, and plaintiff was injured as hereinafter alleged.

"Third. On information and belief, plaintiff alleges that defendant's servants in charge of the said passenger train knew of its presence and that the said passenger was following close after on the same block; that said servants had been warned to that effect by a caution card or notice delivered to them at Pensaukee, a station next north of Little Suamico, providing and directing that they proceed with caution, prepared to stop within their vision, and that they might expect to find extra 116, plaintiff's said freight train, within the block; that, notwithstanding, defendant's servants in charge and control of said passenger train did not proceed with caution, and so as to be able to stop within the vision, but recklessly, carelessly, and negligently ran said passenger train at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and so ran it against and into the said freight at said place.

"Fourth. That the defendant's servants, the train despatcher, and others having control of the running of said trains, while the said freight was proceeding south, carelessly and negligently suffered and caused the said passenger train to be let onto the said block with the said freight, thereby causing the said passenger to enter the block and proceed on its way southerly before the block was clear, and before the freight had left it, which made it possible and likely that such an accident might happen.

"Fifth. That the said passenger train, by reason of the aforesaid negligence, ran into the said freight with great force and violence, and the plaintiff was, by the said negligence, severely and greatly injured, to wit, plaintiff's left hip and leg were severely sprained and injured; that he was confined to the hospital for some ten days on account thereof, and suffered great pain; that said injury has continued, causes the plaintiff pain, and renders him unable to do any kinds of manual labor that he could formerly do; that said injury has caused plaintiff loss and damage in expense for treatment, and in loss of time and earnings still does, and will in the future, greatly impair plaintiff's ability to earn a livelihood,—all to his damage in the sum of $5,000.

"Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for said sum and for costs."

Among other things, the defendant set up facts showing that at the time of injury the plaintiff and defendant were engaged in interstate commerce, and that the cause of action, if any existed, was under the Federal act (act April 22, 1908, chap. 149, 35 Stat. at L. 65, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1913, §§ 8657-8665), not under the laws of the state of Wisconsin. Judgment was demanded by defendant abating the action.

Afterwards the plaintiff was allowed to amend his complaint by adding allegations to the effect that defendant's road runs through the state of Michigan and between the cities of Green Bay, Wisconsin, and Menominee, Michigan, and that plaintiff and defendant were, at the time of the injury alleged, engaged in interstate commerce. Defendant then amended its answer, setting up the statute of limitations. At the time of the amendment of the complaint, two years from the time of the alleged injury had expired. The court below held that the original cause of action was one under the state law, and that the amendment of the complaint set up a cause of action under the Federal act, and that such action was barred by the two-year statute, and sustained the defendant's demurrer and dismissed the complaint. The plaintiff appealed to this court from the judgment dismissing the complaint.

Messrs. Martin, Martin, & Martin, for appellant:

The amendment does not introduce a new cause of action, but is descriptive of the original action, and relates back to the commencement of the action.

Mr. Edward M. Smart, for respondent:

An amendment of the complaint changing the cause of action from one under the Wisconsin statute to one under the Federal employers' liability act constitutes the substitution of an entire new cause of action, so as to make the statute of limitations applicable.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The point involved upon this appeal, under the assignments of error, is whether the amended complaint set up a different cause of action than that stated in the original complaint. The contention of the appellant is that there is but one cause of action, and that under the Federal act, while on the part of the respondent it is insisted that the original complaint set up a cause of action under the state law, and that the amendment changed it from a cause of action under the state law to one under the Federal act.

It is obvious that but one cause of action existed upon all the facts stated in the amended complaint. It is equally obvious that the original complaint was defective in failing to state certain facts going to show that at the time the injury was sustained the parties were engaged in interstate commerce. Nothing stated in the amended complaint was in conflict or inconsistent with the allegations of the original complaint. The cause of action upon which the plaintiff sought to recover damages was defectively stated in the original complaint, and the defects were cured by the amendment. But one cause of action was stated. The amendment related back to the original complaint and became a part of it; hence the statute of limitation was no defense. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wulf, 226 U. S. 570, 57 L. ed. 355, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 135, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 134; Gainesville Midland R. Co. v. Vandiver, 141 Ga. 350, 80 S. E. 997; Bixler v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (D. C.) 201 Fed. 553; Smith v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 127 C. C. A. 311, 210 Fed. 761; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Goode, 163 Ky. 60, 173 S. W. 329; Vickery v. New London Northern R. Co. 87 Conn. 634, 89 Atl. 277; Schieffelin v. Whipple, 10 Wis. 81; Callahan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 161 Wis. 288, 154 N. W. 449.

Counsel for respondent has favored us with a very able and exhaustive discussion of cases touching the question involved, and we confess that there is some lack of harmony in the decisions. We think, however, that most, if not all, of the authorities cited by counsel for respondent, can be distinguished from the instant case.

We shall not attempt to discuss the numerous cases referred to by counsel for respondent, except two which are particularly relied upon, namely, Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler, 158 U. S. 285, 39 L. ed. 983, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, and Meinshausen v. A. Gettelman Brewing Co. 133 Wis. 95, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 250, 113 N. W. 408.

In Meinshausen v. A. Gettelman Brewing Co., supra, there were two causes of action, the amended complaint setting up a new and different cause of action from that set up in the original complaint; therefore the case is not in point.

We think a careful examination of Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler, supra, will show that it is clearly distinguishable from the instant case. In the Wyler Case the amendment L.R.A.1916D.

changed not only the cause of action, but the nature and substance of the cause of action. The whole discussion in the opinion in the Wyler Case goes upon the idea that an entirely new and different cause of action cannot be set up by way of amendment and thus escape the plea of the statute of limitation on the ground that the new cause of action related back to the time of filing the complaint. But the facts in the Wyler Case and the reasoning in the opinion have no application to a case where there is but one cause of action, which is defectively stated and the defect cured by amendment.

The learned trial judge below seems to have attached importance to the fact that counsel for appellant stated that he intended to state a cause of action under the state law. We think this statement wholly immaterial. The mental operations of counsel could not create two causes of action where but one existed. The intent of the pleader might be significant or helpful in giving construction to an allegation which was ambiguous or of doubtful meaning. But there is no such question here.

There is another feature of this case which is worthy of notice. When the defendant answered the original complaint it set up the facts which were omitted in the plaintiff's defective complaint and necessary to perfect the cause of action under the Federal act, and which were afterwards set up by plaintiff in the amendment complained of. The defendant was therefore in no way surprised or prejudiced by the amendment. Doubtless the case could have gone to trial on the pleadings as originally framed, and the complaint on the trial amended or treated as amended in accordance with the issues made by the pleadings as originally framed. Callahan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 161 Wis. 288, 154 N. W. 449; Bieri v. Fonger, 139 Wis. 150, 120 N. W. 862; Grabner v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 159 Wis. 414, 150 N. W. 489; Wabash R. Co. v. Hayes, 234 U. S. 86, 58 L. ed. 1226, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, 6 N. C. C. A. 224.

As said in Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler, 158 U. S. at pp. 297, 298, 39 L. ed. 990, 991, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 882: "The whole doctrine of relation rests in a fiction of law, adopted to subserve, and not to defeat, right and justice."

We are convinced that the amendment did not introduce a new cause of action, but cured the defective cause of action originally pleaded; hence the amendment was proper.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

Barnes, J., dissenting:

The original complaint carefully avoided any reference to the Federal statute. It contained no allegation tending to show that plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce when hurt. It shows, with considerable care and particularity, that he was engaged in intrastate commerce. Had a motion been made to make the pleading more definite and certain in reference to the nature of plaintiff's employment, it would have received short shift, because it was neither indefinite nor uncertain in this regard. If the action had been begun on this complaint in the Federal court, it would, I think, very promptly have been held that it did not state a cause of action under the Federal act. Defendant pleaded as a defense to the action that plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce when injured. Had plaintiff demurred to this defense, the demurrer would, I believe, have been just as promptly overruled, on the theory that such answer, if true, stated a good defense. A perfect cause of action was stated under the law of Wisconsin, while no cause of action was stated under the law of the United States. To be sure, little need be added to the complaint to bring the case under the Federal law. The statement of the simple fact that at the time plaintiff was injured he was engaged in interstate commerce would have been all-sufficient. But the pleading of this simple fact would produce important results. Without such allegation the rights of the parties would have to be determined by the existing law in one jurisdiction. With it they would have to be determined by the law of another jurisdiction. The change indicated would work a change from state to Federal law, and there are substantial and important differences between them. Under the state law contributory negligence is a complete defense where the negligence of the defendant is less than that of the servant. If the servant is negligent, but his negligence is less than that of the master, there can be a full recovery Stat. 1911, § 1816. Under the Federal act contributory negligence is not a defense, but affects the amount of recovery. Under the state law assumption of hazard is no defense to such an action as we have here. Under the Federal law it is a complete defense. Under the state statute defendant would be liable for the negligence of a fellow servant when such negligence causes the injury in whole or in greater part. The Federal statute is different in verbiage at least. The manner of submitting the two actions is different, and the beneficiaries are different. A cause of action includes the facts showing plaintiff's right and its violation by the defendant. McArthur v. L.R.A.1916D.

Moffett, 143 Wis. 564, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 26-, 128 N. W. 445. Enough has been said to show that a person who is injured by a railway company while engaged in intrastate commerce has different rights and a different cause of action from what he would have, had he been injured while engaged in interstate commerce.

It is true that the plaintiff did not, in fact, have two causes of action in reference to which he might exercise a right of election. There was only one cause of action, and whether it came under state or Federal law depended on the facts. Undoubtedly the pleader in the present case was mistaken as to what the facts were when the complaint was drawn. It was stated on the oral argument by counsel for the appellant that it was supposed that the train on which plaintiff was employed when injured started from Marinette, when as a matter of fact it started from Menominee. Instead of its being an intrastate train, it was an interstate train. On the facts before him the able counsel for the plaintiff stated a perfectly good cause of action under the state law, such a cause as he frankly said he intended to state. There is no defect in the pleading. It is almost a model. Counsel found himself in the position he would have been in had he brought an action of tort, and found, when he came to trial, that on his evidence he could only recover on contract; or if he had brought an action on express contract, but found that he could not prove it and would have to recover on quantum meruit if at all. The cause of action declared on would be different from the one on which recovery could be had. Now if a client discloses to his lawyer the facts on which he claims to have a right of action against someone and such facts would give a right of action, and the pleader, following the facts as they have been detailed to him, states a perfectly good cause of action in the complaint drawn, I do not believe there is any infirmity in the pleading, or that it contains a defective statement of a cause of action. The trouble is with the facts, not with the pleading. A cause of action is defectively stated when some material allegation is omitted therefrom and without which the complaint on its face does not state any cause of action whatever. Whether a cause of action is stated, as well as the nature of the cause of action, must be determined from an examination of the complaint itself, and not from a consideration of extraneous facts which are not set forth in the pleading. It is a contradiction to say in one breath that a complaint states a good cause of action and in the next to say that it states a defective cause of action. Whether it is one or the other must be determined from the face of the pleading. It cannot be that a good cause of action cannot be set forth in a complaint simply because the party is unable to prove the necessary facts to establish it.

In this instance the plaintiff was anxious to bring his case under the state law, and the defendant was desirous that it should fall under the Federal act. Both were of the mind that it would be more advantageous for the defendant to have the case come under the Federal law. This court had decided that unless the question of the application of the Federal law was raised in some appropriate way before or during the trial, the defendant would be held to have waived the benefit of it. Leora v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 156 Wis. 386, 146 N. W. 520, 8 N. C. C. A. 108. So the defendant, to protect its rights here, promptly raised the question at the first opportunity by appropriate averments in its answer. Under our Code system of pleading, the allegation stood as denied unless the plaintiff chose to amend his complaint by alleging the same fact. It is said in the opinion of the court that because of this allegation the defendant was in no way surprised or prejudiced by the amendment, and that the case could have "gone to trial on the pleadings as originally framed, and the complaint on the trial amended or treated as amended in accordance with the issues made by the pleadings as originally framed."

This is a rather jaunty way to dispose of what will, I think, at least be conceded to be a close question. One of the issues raised by the original pleading was whether the plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce when hurt. The defendant took the affirmative and the plaintiff the negative of the question. If the defendant prevailed, it would be entitled to judgment dismissing the complaint. If plaintiff then brought the proper action, the bar of the statute of limitations would be a complete defense. I hardly think the court seriously intends to hold that an amendment which deprives a litigant of the benefit of a statute of limitations is one which in no way prejudices him. Neither do I think that where a defendant sets up proper defensive matter in an answer which by force of law stands as denied by the plaintiff, the court can thereafter, for the purpose of avoiding a limitation statute, transfer such allegation to the complaint as of the time it was drawn. A defendant should not be made to suffer for drawing a proper pleading. The averment was essential unless defendant was willing to waive the benefit of the Federal law. In this case no trap was laid the plaintiff. He was promptly advised of the dangers ahead. He did not heed the warning given, but because it was given it is held that defendant was not surprised or prejudiced by what was subsequently done. Doubtless the parties could have gone to trial on the pleadings as originally framed. If they did, judgment would have to go for defendant if it prevailed on its contention that the case was within the Federal statute. There would be no occasion to amend or treat as amended the original complaint to make it conform to the issues made by the "pleadings as originally framed," because such issues were made up by the original complaint and answer. It seems to me to be rather grasping at straws in this case to say that the complaint is in any way aided or improved by what is alleged in the answer. If defendant sought a continuance on the ground of surprise when the amended complaint was served, a court would say at once that it was not surprised. But there is no claim of surprise. Defendant is relying on a statute of limitation, and such a defense is no longer unconscionable in this state. Whereatt v. Worth, 108 Wis. 291, 81 Am. St. Rep. 899, 84 N. W. 441.

I dislike to see the plaintiff lose what may be a meritorious cause of action because of the mistake made here. The question before us is one which arises under the laws of the United States and one on which the Federal Supreme Court has the final say. Its decisions in such cases are not only valuable as precedents, but are binding on this court. If I read those decisions aright, that court has held that where rights are asserted under one law in an original pleading and under another by an amended pleading, in other words, where there is a change from law to law, there is a change of causes of action, and that if a limitation statute has run on the amended cause of action at the time the amendment is made, it is a good defense, although it had not run when the action was originally commenced. This is what I think the court decided in Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler, 158 U. S. 285, 39 L. ed. 983, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877. This decision was approved in the Wulf Case, 226 U. S. 575, 57 L. ed. 355, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 135, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 134, where the distinction between it and the case under consideration was clearly pointed out, and where it was held, in accordance with the uniform current of authority, that an amendment changing the beneficiary was not a change of causes of action.

In the opinion of the court it is stated that the Wyler Case is clearly distinguishable from the present case, because there the amendment changed not only the cause of action, but the nature and substance of the cause of action. I am unable to see any distinction in principle between the two cases. In the Wyler Case plaintiff was injured in Kansas and brought a common-law action to recover damages for his injury in the state of Missouri, alleging as a ground of negligence that defendant employed an incompetent fellow servant who was responsible for plaintiff's injury. Thereafter plaintiff, probably doubting his ability to prove the cause of action stated, amended his complaint by alleging that he was injured through the negligence of a fellow servant, referring to the same servant who was alleged to be incompetent in the original complaint. The amendment further set forth that the injury occurred in the state of Kansas, and that under a statute of that state the master was liable for an injury which occurred through the negligence of a fellow servant. To this amendment the defendant set up, by way of defense, that the statute of limitations had run at the time the complaint was amended, and the question, and the sole question, in the case, was whether there was a change of causes of action. The original action, as before stated, was the usual common-law action for negligence. The amended complaint was based on the common law as amended in the particular stated by a statute of the state of Kansas. The court held that there was a change of causes of action because there was a change from law to law. In the instant case the action was brought under the common law as amended by the statutes of the state of Wisconsin. Under the amended complaint a cause of action was stated under the common law as amended by the statutes of the United States. It seems to me that there is a change from law to law as much in the one case as there is in the other, and that the doctrine of the Wyler Case is fully approved in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wulf, supra. If I have a correct concept of what has been decided in these two cases, I think they are decisive of the case at bar.

Cases not decided by the Federal Supreme Court do not have the same binding force and effect on this court as do the decisions of that court, but it is entirely germane to the question under discussion to say that the great weight of authority supports the contention here made by the respondent. Among the cases holding that under substantially similar facts the allowance of such an amendment as was here made changes the cause of action stated in the original complaint, and that the defense of the statute of limitations is available as of the time the amendment is made, are the following: Allen v. Tuscarora Valley R. Co. L.R.A.1916D.

229 Pa. 97, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1096, 140 Am. St. Rep. 714, 78 Atl. 34; Bradley v. Chicago-Virden Coal Co. 231 Ill. 622, 83 N. E. 424; Henderson v. Moweaqua Coal Min. & Mfg. Co. 145 Ill. App. 637; McHugh v. St. Louis Transit Co. 190 Mo. 85, 88 S. W. 853; Wasson v. Boland, 136 Mo. App. 622, 118 S. W. 663; Hall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 157 Fed. 464, affirmed in 98 C. C. A. 664, 174 Fed. 1021; Wongert v. Carpenter, 101 Mich. 395, 59 N. W. 662; Hughes v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 158 App. Div. 443, 143 N. Y. Supp. 603; Moliter v. Washash R. Co. 180 Mo. App. 84, 168 S. W. 250; Brinkmeier v. Missouri P. R. Co. 81 Kan. 101, 105 Pac. 221; Creteau v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 113 Minn. 418, 129 N. W. 855.

The cases relied on by appellant, with two or three not very important exceptions, are cases where there was a change of beneficiary by amendment. Such a change is held by nearly all courts not to change the cause of action. In fact I see little difference between the situation presently before the court and that which confronted this court in Stevens v. Brooks, 23 Wis. 196; Meinshausen v. A. Gettelman Brewing Co. 133 Wis. 95, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 250, 113 N. W. 408, and Haverlund v. Chicago St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 143 Wis. 415, 128 N. W. 273.

Vinje, J.:

I concur in the foregoing dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Barnes.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

GEORGE S. CHATFIELD COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

FRANCIS T. REEVES, Mayor of Waterbury.

(87 Conn. 63, 86 Atl. 750.)

Mandamus — to compel mayor to sign warrant — remedy at law.

Since the grantor has an adequate remedy at law to recover the purchase price of land sold and conveyed to a city, he will not be awarded a writ of mandamus to compel the mayor to countersign a warrant for the money, although the city charter prescribed such warrant as the method by which payments are to be made out of the city treasury.

For other cases, see Mandamus, I. d. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(May 8, 1913.)

Note. — For mandamus to compel issuance of municipal warrant to pay indebtedness, see annotation following this case, post, 324.

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County dismissing an application for a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to countersign an order for money in payment of land purchased by the board of education for school purposes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nathaniel R. Bronson, Lawrence L. Lewis, and Charles E. Hart, Jr., for appellant:

The lack of adequate remedy at law justifies the institution of this mandamus proceeding.

Prentice, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator claims that the city of Waterbury owes it $9,000 for a tract of land sold and conveyed by it to the city. The charter of the city prescribes the method by which payments are to be made out of its treasury. The machinery thus provided includes the countersignature by its mayor of an order drawn by the city clerk upon the city treasurer. It is charged that the defendant as the city's mayor, in violation of his duty as such officer, neglected and refused to perform the ministerial duty of countersigning an order in favor of the relator for said sum of $9,000, duly and regularly prepared and presented to him for the payment of the relator's claim then due and payable, and the superior court is asked to issue its writ of mandamus to compel such countersignature.

A "writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, to be applied only under exceptional conditions, and is not to be extended beyond its well-established limits." Lahiff v. St. Joseph's Total Abstinence & Benev. Soc. 76 Conn. 648, 65 L.R.A. 92, 100 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 57 Atl. 692.

"The essential conditions without which the writ will not be issued to enforce the performance of a ministerial duty, are (1) that the party against whom the writ is sought must be under an obligation imposed by law to perform some such duty, that is, a duty in respect to the performance of which he may not exercise any discretion; (2) that the party applying for the writ has a clear legal right to have the duty performed; and (3) that there is no other sufficient remedy." Bassett v. Atwater, 65 Conn. 365, 360, 32 L.R.A. 575, 32 Atl. 937; State ex rel. Berger v. Hurley, 73 Conn. 536, 48 Atl. 215. The same principle is more succinctly stated in State v. New Haven & N. Co. 45 Conn. 331, 343, as follows: "The writ of mandamus is designed to enforce a plain, positive duty upon the relation of one who has a clear legal right to have it performed, and where there is no other adequate legal remedy." The existence of the conditions first enumerated in Bassett v. Atwater, as above recited, leads inevitably to the result that this relator is not entitled to the writ which he seeks, unless, among other things, the city, during the time of the mayor's neglect or refusal to countersign the order, was indebted to it for the amount named therein, and it was entitled to have forthwith that amount from the city. Under such conditions, the relator would be in a position to successfully maintain a civil action for the recovery of the $9,000, and, judgment being entered therefor, to have an execution which he could satisfy by levying upon the private estate of any inhabitant of the city. Beardsley v. Smith, 16 Conn. 368, 380, 41 Am. Dec. 148; Union v. Crawford, 19 Conn. 331, 333. Here was a remedy through a resort to ordinary legal proceedings. Was it adequate or sufficient within the meaning and application of the rule above quoted?

We have always recognized the extraordinary character of proceedings by mandamus, and that its use would be justified only when necessary to supplement the deficiencies of ordinary legal processes. Bassett v. Atwater, supra. We have consistently held to this rule, oft repeated and emphasized, and have applied it in both its letter and spirit. All attempts to appropriate it to use as an ordinary civil action have been steadily discountenanced. In this we have been less liberal in permitting its employment than have the courts in some jurisdictions. For instance, it is not uncommonly held elsewhere that the existence of adequate equitable remedy would not prevent the issuance of the writ. Brennan v. Butler, 22 R. I. 228, 47 Atl. 320; State ex rel. Wilson v. Longstreet, 38 N. J. L. 312; Baltimore University v. Colton, 98 Md. 623, 64 L.R.A. 108, 57 Atl. 14; State ex rel. Elliott v. Custer, 11 Ind. 210.

We have held otherwise, and confined the issuance of the writ to situations where the aggrieved party has adequate remedy neither at law nor in equity. State ex rel. Howard v. Hartford Street R. Co. 76 Conn. 174, 184, 56 Atl. 506. So, again, we have held that mandamus will not lie where an action on the case will afford satisfaction equivalent to the specific relief claimed. American Asylum v. Phoenix Bank, 4 Conn. 172, 178, 10 Am. Dec. 112. "Adequate remedy at law means a remedy vested in the complainant to which he may at all times resort at his own option fully and freely without let or hindrance." Atwood v. Partree, 56 Conn. 80, 83, 14 Atl. 85, 87; Wheeler v. Bedford, 54 Conn. 244, 249, 7 Atl. 22.

The relator's remedy by civil action is one at law, and it would result in his obtaining the identical relief he seeks, to wit, the recovery of the amount due him. No legal obstacle to obtaining it could be interposed which could not have been, and in fact was not, interposed in the present proceeding. The relator would not be relegated to an uncertain source of satisfaction. The immediate result of the litigation would, in fact, be more favorable to it, as it would secure not merely an order for money, which might be ignored, but a process which could be effectually used to obtain it. In both cases the existence of a present obligation would have to be shown. That shown, the relator's course in a civil action would be L.R.A.1916D.

simple. The provisions of the city charter regulating payments out of the treasury prescribe several steps to be taken before the mayor is required to countersign an order. The obligation assumed in a mandamus proceeding to establish that these have been regularly taken adds not a little to the relator's burden. We fail to discover any particular in which the remedy by an ordinary civil action is not as convenient, beneficial, and efficient as that which mandamus could afford. For this reason alone, the trial court was amply justified in denying the peremptory writ. Substantially the same question here presented arose in Colley v. Webster, 59 Conn. 361, 20 Atl. 334, where a prosecuting agent sought the writ against a clerk of the police court to compel the payment of certain fees which had been refused. Among other reasons assigned for denying the writ was the fact that, if the agent was entitled to the fees, he had a good cause of action against the city therefor, and that, for that reason, he had adequate remedy by such action.

Counsel for the relator have referred us to a number of cases, and there are others to the same effect, which have held that the signature of a public officer to an order, warrant, or other paper calling for the payment of money may be compelled by mandamus. We do not question that this may be true under certain conditions. They have also pointed out to us a few cases which they claim support their position here. Upon their face they may appear to do so; but upon examination it will be found that they present conditions by no means analogous to those in the present case as bearing upon the matter of the alternative remedy. McCullough v. Brooklyn, 23 Wend. 458, is one of the cases thus referred to. Upon examination it will be found that the only alternative remedy which the relator in that case had was an action against the officer for neglect of duty, with its uncertainty as to satisfaction of judgment. There was no right of action against the city. It was upon these grounds that the court rested its conclusion that the relator had no other adequate remedy, and that therefore mandamus was an appropriate one. In the opinion appears the following language, often quoted and sometimes misconceived or misused, upon which, doubtless, counsel here rely: "Although, as a general rule, a mandamus will not lie where the party has another remedy, it is not universally true in relation to corporations and ministerial officers. Notwithstanding they may be liable in an action on the case for a neglect of duty, they may be compelled by mandamus to exercise their functions according to law." Page 461. It needs only a casual study of this language to discover that it furnishes no justification for the broad proposition that whenever a public corporation is indebted to a creditor mandamus will lie to compel its auditor, disbursing or other officer, whose duty it may be to draw, approve, or countersign an order, warrant, or check, or do any other ministerial act required of him by the prescribed procedure in the matter of payment, to perform that duty. The limitation of the doctrine of the case is clearly indicated in the passage cited, and unmistakably brought out in other portions of the opinion. Reference to other New York cases clearly discloses the distinction recognized in the McCullough Case, places the doctrine of that jurisdiction beyond question, and manifests its complete harmony without conclusion that, where there is direct and complete remedy by action against the municipality, mandamus will not lie. People ex rel. Perkins v. Hawkins, 46 N. Y. 9, 11; People ex rel. Lunney v. Campbell, 72 N. Y. 496, 498. The following language of the opinion in the first of the two cases last cited leaves no room for misunderstanding: "Nor will a mandamus lie where the party has a plain legal remedy by action. . . . An action against public officers for neglect to perform their duty would not be considered such a remedy as to supersede that by mandamus."

State ex rel. Ahrens v. Fiedler, 43 N. J. L. 400, is another case relied upon by counsel. There it was sought to compel a mayor to sign an order upon the treasurer for the payment of a claim against the city. It was said that the relator did not have adequate remedy by an action to recover the claim, for the reason that, even though he could maintain an action against the city, a judgment thus obtained would not advance his claim beyond its present status. Such judgment, it was said, would fix the liability of the city and determine the amount due, which had already been done by city action, and the plain implication of the opinion is that it would accomplish nothing more. State ex rel. Minneapolis Tribune Co. v. Ames, 31 Minn. 444, 18 N. W.

277, is a similar case also referred to. It was there held that a city officer might be compelled to sign an order on the city treasurer for the payment of an obligation of the city. The court said that there was not adequate remedy by action to recover the claim, for the reason that upon the recovery of judgment it would be necessary for the relator to present its claim to the comptroller and the council and obtain an appropriation for its payment upon an order which must be signed by the defendant official, or to wait until a tax could be levied to pay it under a charter provision referred to. It is manifest that the relators in these two cases did not stand in the same position with respect to their right to obtain satisfaction under a judgment against the city, as that in which this relator stands, and that the difference is a material one.

The opinion in Apgar v. School Dist. 34 N. J. L. 308, when read by itself, has the appearance of giving more support to the relator's contention than any other to which we have been referred. When, however, it is read in the light which the later case in the same jurisdiction, already noticed, sheds upon the position in which a judgment creditor attempting to secure satisfaction of his judgment is placed in that state, that support disappears.

There is also a class of cases where the claims were against the state, ordinarily not subject to suit. We have not examined all of them to determine whether among them may not be found one or more in jurisdictions where the state had subjected itself to suit. We are satisfied, however, that there are few, if any, such in the list.

The respondent asserts that the relator has failed to show either a clear right to receive the $9,000 from the city, or a duty upon the respondent in the prescribed course of procedure to countersign the order, and urges a variety of reasons for this contention. In view of our conclusion already reached, we have no occasion to pass upon the correctness of it.

There is no error.

The other Judges concur.

I. Scope.

This note is limited to a consideration of the cases involving the right of a municipal creditor to compel an officer of the city to issue or sign a warrant, and does not concern itself with the right of the creditor to demand that his claim be audited or that his warrant be paid.

Upon this latter point see the note with respect to mandamus to compel payment of municipal debt by custodian of municipal funds.<sup>1</sup>

In connection with this subject reference is also made to the note on the unconstitutionality of statute as defense against mandamus to compel payment of public money.<sup>2</sup>

II. Ministerial and discretionary functions.

The cases show that the general rule holding mandamus proper in proceedings to compel the performance of ministerial functions, and improper in proceedings to compel the performance of discretionary functions, is applicable to this branch of the subject. Indeed, the rule is of very general application, and in only one case has it at all been called into question.<sup>3</sup>

On account of the dissimilarity in the duties and functions of the various city officers, and because of the difference in acts and ordinances creating municipal offices in various cities and states, no rules can be laid down with respect to the nature of the functions of any particular officers or groups of officers. In the very great majority of the cases, however, in which the question has come up for consideration, the function of the officer in question has been held ministerial. The reason for this is plain. In practically every instance a claim must be presented to some preliminary officer or body for audit, allowance, or adjustment of some kind before demand is made for a warrant. This preliminary board or officer having performed a discretionary function in allowing or adjusting the claim, the courts take the view that, in the absence of language in the act or ordinance clearly indicating a grant of discretion to the officer issuing the warrant, nothing remains to the latter but the purely ministerial function of drawing or signing the instrument. This view is a reasonable one. In the absence of language indicating an intent to submit claims to a second examination, it seems that such an intent ought not to be presumed.

Where, for example, a claim has been submitted to the city council<sup>4</sup> or to a

<sup>3</sup> In Wood v. Strother (1888) 76 Cal. 545, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, 18 Pac. 766, however, where the action is brought against an auditor who, according to statute, "must be satisfied that the proceedings have been legal and fair" before issuing a street assessment warrant, and where it is urged that if such auditor has examined the proceedings "and become satisfied that they are not legal, the most that can be said is that he has committed an error in a matter confided to his discretion, and that the function of the writ is not to review such exercise of discretion," the court holds it a "perversion of language" to say that mandamus will not issue to control discretionary actions. "The propriety of the issuance of the writ in any case must depend upon whether, under the law of the state where the litigation arises, the determination was intended to be final; and if not, upon whether the system of practice furnishes any other adequate remedy," says the court. "There is nothing in the language of the act," it is said later on, "which shows that it was intended to be final. It certainly would not be final in favor of the contractor. In the numerous cases in which street assessments have been before the court, we have never seen it suggested that the signature of the auditor cured previous illegality; and it seems clear that it would not do so. Why, then, should it be final against the contractor, and be conclusive that the proceedings are illegal when it is apparent that they are not so?"

<sup>4</sup> Where the council has allowed a claim for a rebate by the holder of a liquor license who has gone out of business, the duty of the mayor to sign the warrant drawn in pursuance thereof is ministerial and may be compelled by mandamus. State ex rel. Maddaugh v. Ritter (1913) 74 Wash. 649, 134 Pac. 492.

Under a statute providing that "all moneys shall be drawn from the treasury in pursuance of an order of the city council by a treasury warrant signed by the mayor and countersigned by the clerk," the act required of the mayor in signing a warrant issued upon a claim allowed by the council is merely ministerial, and mandamus will lie to compel his performance thereof. People v. Hastings (1880) 5 Ill. App. 436. The claim in this case was for lumber furnished the city.

And where a borough council has ordered the payment of a debt on a building contract, the president's function in signing the order is merely ministerial, and he may be compelled to perform it by mandamus. Breslin v. Earley (1908) 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 49.

Where the council has appropriated a certain sum to be paid for property con-city board,<sup>5</sup> and has been allowed, the function of the auditor or mayor in issuing or signing the warrant is merely ministerial. The council in the one instance, and the board on the other, have examined the facts and with due consideration have arrived at their conclusion. It is hardly to be believed that the opinion of the auditor or the mayor was intended to overthrow that conclusion, in the absence of specific statutory provision to that effect.<sup>6</sup>

With respect to the office of mayor, however, there must be taken into consideration the veto power, which is usually one of the incidents thereof. Distinction must be made between an exercise of this power and the mere refusal to sign a warrant in pursuance of an order or resolution approved by the mayor or passed over his veto. The veto power is unquestionably a discretionary function.<sup>7</sup> However, the exercise of the veto exhausts the discretionary functions of the mayor with respect to a particular resolution, and if the council, also in the exercise of discretion, passes the resolution over his veto, he can offer no further resistance. When, therefore, warrants for the payment of the claim thus approved over his veto are presented for his signature, a ministerial function only remains, and it is his duty to sign irrespectively of his objections.<sup>8</sup>

When a claim has been audited and approved, by the proper officers before presentation to other officers for signature, it seems that a situation is presented somewhat similar to the one presented where a claim has been approved by the council, although the presumption of exclusive discretion in auditing officers is perhaps weaker than in the case of the legislative body. The function of signing the warrant is regarded as a merely ministerial one, and one, therefore, the performance of which can be compelled by mandamus.<sup>9</sup>

A like situation is presented where a claim is approved by the proper officers, and a certificate of that fact is issued to the officers whose duty it is to draw demned, and the auditor has received the vouchers of the city solicitor therefor in accordance with the ordinance, his duty to issue the warrants on the treasury is ministerial, and he will be compelled by mandamus to perform it. Ryan v. Hoffman (1875) 26 Ohio St. 109.

In People ex rel. Reynolds v. Flagg (1853) 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 503, it is held that the office of comptroller is a subordinate administrative office, and that the comptroller has no right or power to question the "expediency, judiciousness, or discretion of the legal acts of the government." The decision is accordingly reached that such comptroller cannot question a claim which has been allowed by the council, but that he can be compelled by mandamus to issue warrants thereon.

And see Doverspike v. Magee (1912) 51 Pa. Super. Ct. 525, an action by a patrolman to compel the mayor and comptroller to issue and sign a warrant for his salary in accordance with an order passed by the council, where, without specifically holding the functions of such officers to be ministerial, mandamus is held to lie against them.

<sup>5</sup> In Com. ex rel. Walton v. Lyndall (1869) 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 425, where mandamus is issued to the city comptroller, directing him to sign a warrant issued to the relator by the board of school comptrollers for her salary as teacher, the court says that the defendant, being a ministerial officer, may be compelled to perform his functions.

<sup>6</sup> Under a statute providing that a warrant shall not be issued if, for any cause, the comptroller cannot give it his approval, his function of countersigning a warrant is discretionary and cannot be controlled by mandamus. Dechert v. Com. (1886) 113 Pa. L.R.A.1916D.

229, 6 Atl. 229. In this case the claim was for the construction of a sewer and had been approved by the council.

<sup>7</sup> Under a charter providing that all orders upon the city treasurer must be signed by the mayor, except such orders as are passed by the council over his veto, the mayor is given the veto power over orders as well as resolutions, and his refusal to sign an order passed by the council for the payment of aldermen amounts to an exercise of that discretionary power, and mandamus will not be issued to compel his signature. State ex rel. Rudolph v. Hutchinson (1908) 134 Wis. 283, 114 N. W. 453.

<sup>8</sup> Where the council has approved a claim over the mayor's veto, his resistance to the claim is overcome, and the duty of countersigning warrants drawn for the payment thereof is merely a ministerial duty, the refusal to perform which will be compelled by mandamus. State ex rel. Ahrens v. Fiedler (1881) 43 N. J. L. 400 (claim for filling lots); State ex rel. Salmon v. Haynes (1887) 50 N. J. L. 97, 11 Atl. 151 (salary of stenographer); State ex rel. American La France Fire Engine Co. v. Seymour (1909) 79 N. J. L. 92, 74 Atl. 439 (claim for fire apparatus); State ex rel. C. Reiss Coal Co. v. Born (1897) 97 Wis. 542, 73 N. W. 105 (claim for removing bar from river).

<sup>9</sup> Where the comptroller has audited claims and approved them, his remaining duty to issue warrants thereon is merely ministerial and may be compelled by mandamus. State ex rel. Pinse v. Mount (1869) 21 La. Ann. 352.

In the absence of a contrary provision in a city charter, "a claim of a class for the payment of which the council is empowered to make an appropriation, having and sign the warrant. Under such circumstances it is considered that all the discretion necessary has been exercised by the certifying officer or body, and that nothing but the ministerial function of drawing and signing the warrant remains.<sup>10</sup> This rule is, of course, always open to an exception where the statute clearly indicates an intention to impose upon the countersigning officers discretionary power with respect to the claim.<sup>11</sup>

Submission of proper claims to a court for settlement would seem to render superfluous any further exercise of discretion by any officer or body with respect thereto. When, therefore, a court has settled or approved a claim properly submitted to it, the function exercised by those officers whose duty it is to draw and sign a warrant therefor is merely ministerial, and its performance may be compelled by mandamus.<sup>12</sup> first been audited and adjusted by the comptroller, and an appropriation for its payment made and authorized by the requisite and duly recorded vote of the council, when an order for its payment, in due form and duly signed by the clerk, is presented to the mayor for his signature, it is his duty as mayor to sign it within such reasonable time as may be necessary to enable him to make the inquiries before indicated, as to whether the council has kept within its jurisdiction and whether the appropriation has been authorized by the necessary vote," and mandamus may be sought to compel his signature. State ex rel. Minneapolis Tribune Co. v. Ames (1884) 31 Minn. 440, 18 N. W. 277; State ex rel. Trebb v. Vasaly (1906) 98 Minn. 46, 107 N. W. 818. This is on the ground that such duty is purely ministerial.

However, in People ex rel. Duff v. Booth (1867) 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 31, affirming (1866) 32 How. Pr. 17, under a charter provision to the effect that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except upon warrants signed by the mayor and comptroller, and countersigned by the clerk, it is held that "the power of determining a litigated claim against the city has not been vested in the comptroller, or any of the city officers, to the exclusion of the mayor," and that the duty to sign warrants was not purely ministerial. The claim in this case was for repairing streets, and after it had been audited the mayor refused to sign the warrant on the ground that the claimant was not the partner of the person to whom the warrant was drawn.

<sup>10</sup> Where, under a contract between the city and a person who is about to engage in the construction of a public improvement, the certificate of acceptance of the city engineer, approved by the commissioner of public works, is made conclusive upon the contractor, the comptroller's duty to issue warrants for the payment of claims with respect to the work is merely ministerial and may be compelled by mandamus. Re Freel (1896) 148 N. Y. 165, 42 N. E. 586, affirming (1895) 89 Hun, 79, 35 N. Y. Supp. 59 (reservoir); People ex rel. Rodgers v. Coler (1900) 56 App. Div. 98, 67 N. Y. Supp. 701, reversing (1900) 32 Misc. 78, 66 N. Y. Supp. 163, affirmed on other grounds in (1901) 166 N. Y. 1, 52 L.R.A. 814, 82 Am. St. Rep. 605, 59 N. E. 716 (street grading); People ex rel. L.R.A.1916D.

Treat v. Coler (1900) 56 App. Div. 459, 68 N. Y. Supp. 767, affirmed in (1901) 166 N. Y. 144, 59 N. E. 776 (sewer); People ex rel. Rolf v. Coler (1901) 58 App. Div. 131, 68 N. Y. Supp. 448 (pier).

And under a statute providing that the fees of the harbor master shall be prescribed by the board of harbor commissioners and paid by the city, upon the certificate of the harbor commissioners the city council is not vested with discretion with respect to order the drawing of the warrant, and mandamus may be brought to compel it to act. Quigg v. Evans (1898) 121 Cal. 546, 53 Pac. 1093.

<sup>11</sup> Under a statute providing that the comptroller may refuse to countersign warrants if, from any cause, he cannot give his approval thereto, his function in countersigning such warrants is discretionary, and if any reasonable ground arises for his disapproval thereof, he cannot be compelled by mandamus to perform such function. Com. ex rel. City Sewage Co. v. Hancock (1872) 9 Phila. (Pa.) 535. In this case the claim had been certified by the board of health for services rendered by relator under a contract with respect to cleaning the streets.

<sup>12</sup> Where the legislature provides that the court shall determine the compensation due referees for adjudging claims against a city, no discretion is left to the mayor and council with respect to the issuance of warrants for the amounts of such sums as are awarded, and mandamus will issue against them to compel their performance of the act. Guthrie v. Territory (1892) 1 Okla. 188, 21 L.R.A. 841, 31 Pac. 190.

And where by statute the circuit court is given the duty of making settlement of all claims due the sheriff, the auditor of the city has no power or authority to inquire into the correctness of such settlement, and he may be compelled to draw warrants therefor by mandamus, when his only defense for his failure to do so is the incorrectness of the settlement. State ex rel. Troll v. Brown (1898) 72 Mo. App. 651.

In Shaw v. Howell (1866) 18 La. Ann. 195, the duty of the auditor to issue a warrant was held ministerial where the clerk and judge of the district court had approved a voucher for the claim in accordance with law; and mandamus was issued to compel the issuance thereof.

to judgment both the correctness of the claim and its proper amount are fixed, and no officer charged with the duty of drawing warrants therefor may be heard to object.<sup>13</sup>

In the case of claims for salary by public officers or employees whose compensation is fixed by law, the function of drawing warrants therefor, and countersigning them, is considered merely ministerial.<sup>14</sup> This rule is, of course, open to exception where the statute expressly grants the power of discretion to the officer whose duty it is to draw or countersign warrants.<sup>15</sup> And where the amount of compensation is nowhere fixed by law, nor ascertainable by computation, such discretion must be exercised in fixing the amount properly due as is entirely incompatible with the position that the act is merely ministerial.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>13</sup> "The drawing of a warrant for the payment of a demand or claim which has been audited, approved, or established by the action of the city council, or by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, is regarded as a duty purely of a ministerial nature, and hence properly falling within the scope of mandamus." Altgelt v. Campbell (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 78 S. W. 967. In this case the claim upon which the action was based had been reduced to judgment.

Mandamus was held proper in State ex rel. Carondelet Canal & Nav. Co. v. Pillsbury (1878) 30 La. Ann. 705, to compel an auditor to issue a warrant for the payment of a judgment, on the ground that, the amount of the indebtedness having been fixed by proper authority, the ministerial act of drawing the warrant only remained.

<sup>14</sup> "Mandamus is an appropriate remedy to compel an auditing officer to issue a warrant for the compensation of the employees or officers of a city, county, or state, where the amount thereof is so fixed by law, ordinance, or otherwise that the act of auditing the same and drawing a warrant accordingly is merely ministerial in character." Scott v. Boyle (1912) 164 Cal. 321, 128 Pac. 941. In this case mandamus was issued to compel the city auditor to draw a warrant in favor of a deputy sealer of weights and measures for his salary.

In State ex rel. Dudley v. Daggett (1902) 28 Wash. 1, 68 Pac. 340, an action by corporation counsel to compel the issuance of warrants for his salary, it is said: "The salary being fixed by law and payable in warrants drawn on the city treasurer, and the duty of the comptroller in the premises being clearly defined by the ordinance and charter, there is no room for the exercise of such judgment or discretion as will preclude the court from compelling the performance of the duty by the writ of mandamus."

In Granger v. French (1908) 152 Mich. 356, 125 Am. St. Rep. 416, 116 N. W. 181, where a justice of the peace is suing to compel the issuance and countersigning of warrants for his salary, the court says that "mandamus is the proper remedy to enforce the payment by a municipal corporation of a salary, the amount of which is fixed."

And in State ex rel. Hawes v. Mason (1899) 153 Mo. 23, 54 S. W. 524, it is held "where the Constitution or an act of the legislature creates an office and fixes the L.R.A.1916D.

salary thereof, the time of the payment of the same, and authorizes or directs the comptroller or auditor to draw his warrant to pay the same, that the Constitution in the one case, and the legislature in the other, thereby makes the appropriation, and no further appropriation is necessary to authorize the auditor to draw his warrant for its payment." Under such a statute dealing with the police department of the city, it is held that the auditor may be compelled by mandamus to draw warrants for the pay roll of the police department, whether the city council has made an appropriation therefor or not.

Where the salary of a public officer is fixed by ordinance, and by ordinance made payable in equal monthly instalments, no further allowance or appropriation by the council is necessary to impose upon the auditor a duty to draw warrants therefor, such as would render him amenable to mandamus. Kendall v. Raybauld (1896) 13 Utah, 226, 44 Pac. 1034.

Mandamus is held in Puterbaugh v. Wadham (1912) 162 Cal. 611, 123 Pac. 804, to be the proper remedy to compel the auditing committee of a city to draw warrants to pay the salary of a justice of the peace, where such salary is fixed by law.

And see Schmitt v. Dooling (1911) 145 Ky. 240, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 881, 140 S. W. 197, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1078, where mandamus was granted city firemen to compel the issuance of warrants for their salaries.

<sup>15</sup> In Runkle v. Com. (1881) 97 Pa. 323, an action to compel the city comptroller to sign warrants for relator's salary as city clerk and secretary of the water board, it is held that, under statutes requiring the comptroller to pass on the rectitude of warrants, his function is discretionary. The court says: "Where a person or body is clothed with judicial, deliberative, or discretionary powers, and he or it has exercised such powers according to his or its discretion, mandamus will not lie to compel a revision or modification of the decision resulting from the exercise of such discretion, though, in fact, the decision may have been wrong."

<sup>16</sup> Where a sergeant of a city was seeking to compel the payment of fees not fixed by statute, it was said in Richmond City v. Epps (1900) 98 Va. 233, 35 S. E. 723, that, "as no provision has been made by statute fixing the fees or the compensation of the sergeant of a city, who is by virtue of his office the keeper of its jail,

III. Illegality or other defense.

In accordance with the general rule with respect of ministerial and discretionary functions, the right of an officer to defend an action of mandamus to compel the issuance of a warrant on the ground of illegality, or other valid defense to the claim, is dependent upon whether his function in issuing the warrant in question is discretionary or ministerial. If the statute has operated to make such function discretionary, the officer unquestionably may make use of such defenses.<sup>17</sup> But if his duty with respect thereto is merely ministerial, there is no ground for permitting him to set up any of the defenses which may exist with reference to the claim.<sup>18</sup> It for receiving and supporting persons confined in jail for a violation of the ordinances of the city; and as the city of Richmond has not adopted by ordinance the scale of fees fixed by statute for receiving and supporting persons confined in jail for the violation of the criminal laws of the state, nor prescribed any other specific compensation to its sergeant for like service, . . . it therefore follows, in accordance with the well-established rule that mandamus only lies in a case of this nature where there is a clear right to a fixed sum of money, or to an amount ascertainable by a mere computation, . . . that the petitioner is not entitled to the writ." And in another place it is said: "Mandamus only lies in a case of this nature where there is a clear right to a fixed sum of money, or to an amount ascertainable by a mere compensation, and where the issue of a warrant therefor and its payment is merely a ministerial duty."

And where, in an action by a sergeant of police to compel the issuance of a warrant for the amount of his salary, there were no allegations nor proof of a definite salary attached to the office, it was held that there was no right to mandamus. Moores v. State (1903) 4 Neb. Unof. 235, 93 N. W. 986.

<sup>17</sup>In Rooney v. Snow (1900) 131 Cal. 51, 63 Pac. 155, an action to compel the city auditor to draw a warrant for the repayment of license money paid to the city under a mistake, it is held that the city is not responsible in the matter, and that, despite the ordinance allowing the claim and directing the auditor to draw a warrant for its payment, the auditor is justified in refusing to draw such warrant, where the city charter requires him to determine the legality of every claim.

And in People ex rel. Green v. Wood (1862) 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 653, 13 Abb. Pr. 374, 22 How. Pr. 286, where the mayor refused to countersign a warrant, it is held that his duty is discretionary, and that, although the claim has been audited and settled by the proper authorities, he may not be compelled by mandamus to countersign the warrant. The court bases its decision on the ground that the sole object of having the mayor countersign such warrants is "to secure the treasury against the negligence or dishonesty of those officers who are intrusted with the settlement of claims against the city." In this case the contention of the mayor was that the relator had not performed his contract for the removal of offal from the city streets. L.R.A.1916D.

In Com. ex rel. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. v. Foster (1906) 215 Pa. 177, 64 Atl. 367, a mandamus was refused against the comptroller of a city for the purpose of compelling him to issue warrants for electric light furnished the city under a contract, where no appropriation had ever been made for the payment of any moneys under the contract, and the comptroller was charged by statute not to suffer any appropriation to be overdrawn.

But although the court holds, in Com. ex rel. Century Co. v. Philadelphia (1896) 176 Pa. 588, 35 Atl. 195, that the duties of the comptroller are partly discretionary, mandamus is issued to compel him to sign warrants for the payment of books purchased by the school board, the court being of the opinion that the suitability of the books to school purposes is not a matter for his consideration.

<sup>18</sup>Where, under city ordinances, the act of the clerk in drawing and countersigning a warrant is merely ministerial, he may be compelled by mandamus to perform such act with respect to a claim audited and allowed by the council, although the reason for his refusal is the illegality of the claim. Wycoff v. Strong (1914) 26 Idaho, 502, 144 Pac. 341. The claim in this case was for materials furnished and work done by plaintiff in the construction of sewers.

In Rice v. Gwinn (1897) 5 Idaho, 394, 49 Pac. 412, under an act providing that "all warrants drawn upon the treasurer must be signed by the mayor," it is held that the mayor has no right to refuse to sign a warrant drawn by the council, although the claim which it is intended to pay is illegal; and mandamus is held proper in such a case to compel the mayor's signature.

And in State ex rel. Kran v. Hodapp (1908) 104 Minn. 309, 116 N. W. 589, where the city auditor refused to draw the order for the payment of a claim for interest on a debt which arose in connection with the improvement of a city park, on the ground that the amount of indebtedness thereby created exceeded the limit authorized by the city charter, it was held that the recorder's duty was merely ministerial, and that he was "in no position to urge the illegality of the contract in defense of his refusal."

And in State ex rel. Wunderlich v. Kal-kofen (1907) 134 Wis. 74, 113 N. W. 1091, an action to compel a town board to issue an order for the payment of a claim allowed in town meeting, it is said: "We know of no reason nor of any authority to support the contention that, after the tax-has been held, however, that a person seeking mandamus must show that he has a clear legal right to have the duty performed.<sup>19</sup> In accordance with this rule the court will deny the writ when it discovers the existence of some illegality or other defense which will raise a doubt as to the relator's right to the relief sought, and he will be left to pursue one of the ordinary actions, in which the defense may properly be considered.<sup>20</sup>

Irrespective of the nature of the payers of a municipality have so submitted to taxation, and the money has actually accumulated in the hands of the public treasurer, and neither the taxpayers nor the electors have in any manner changed their position, the officers upon whom rests the mere ministerial duty of effecting such purpose can legitimately raise the question of the legality of the demand the money was raised to discharge, and delay or defeat the execution of such purpose."

But in McDermont v. Dinnie (1896) 6 N. D. 278, 69 N. W. 294, an action to compel the issuance of a warrant to a judge of the municipal court for his salary, the question of the constitutionality of the statute creating the court is held a proper subject of defense on behalf of the mayor and auditor.

<sup>19</sup> In Scanlan v. Schwab (1902) 103 Ill. App. 93, the court says that mandamus should never be awarded unless the relator has a clear legal right to have the thing sought. The court did not concern itself with the question as to whether the act was ministerial or discretionary. The action was brought to compel the mayor to countersign a warrant drawn in accordance with the orders of the council, which contained a clause allowing interest on the claim. Under statute interest was allowable on warrants only when there were no funds with which to pay them. Mandamus was refused in this case because of the failure of the petition to allege the lack of such funds.

In Stegmaier v. Goeringer (1907) 218 Pa. 499, 67 Atl. 782, 11 Ann. Cas. 973, an action against the comptroller of a city to compel his countersignature of warrants drawn in pursuance of a resolution by the council authorizing the expenditure of a sum of money for decorations during a public celebration, it is held that, no bills or vouchers showing the money to have been expended by relator having been presented to defendant, relator has not shown a specific legal right, nor has he performed all the prerequisite conditions necessary to give him the right to the action. The court says: "When a private relator seeks to compel by mandamus a public official to perform an alleged duty, the burden is on him to show that he has performed every prerequisite condition necessary to compel such action, and that it has been refused by the public official. This is true whether the duty to be performed is ministerial or discretionary, for even if the duty is ministerial the private relator must show that he has placed himself in a position to legally demand the performance of the duty."

448, where it is shown that the relator, who is seeking to compel the issuance of a warrant for money due him as engineer in the erection of a pier, has not performed his contract in all respects, and that the city may have a good defense to his claim, the writ is denied. The court says that "the party moving for the writ must establish a clear legal right thereto."

Where, in State ex rel. O'Hara v. Fagan (1893) 56 N. J. L. 279, 27 Atl. 1089, the mayor refused to sign a warrant for the salary of the counsel to the commissioners of adjustment on the ground that the salary had been overpaid, and that he had approved the resolution passed by council directing the issuance of such warrant by mistake, it was held that, for these two reasons, the relator had not shown himself the possessor of such a right to have the warrant issued as the law ought to enforce, and mandamus was refused.

And where work had been illegally let to a person who was not the lowest bidder, it was held in People ex rel. Coughlin v. Gleason (1890) 121 N. Y. 631, 25 N. E. 4, reversing (1889) 22 N. Y. S. R. 103, 4 N. Y. Supp. 383, (1890) 55 Hun, 610, 30 N. Y. S. R. 351, 8 N. Y. Supp. 728, that the holder of the claim therefor was not entitled to a writ to compel the mayor to sign a warrant.

<sup>20</sup> In Com. ex rel. Century Co. v. Philadelphia (1896) 176 Pa. 588, 35 Atl. 195, an action against the comptroller and the board of education to compel the former to sign warrants to pay for books purchased by the board, it is said that, "had the board of education at any time indicated that there was any defense to this claim, it is clear that there could be no remedy by mandamus, but only by suit prosecuted to judgment."

Where there is a dispute between the city and the electric lighting company which has contracted to light certain buildings, with respect to what buildings are included therein, and the director of public safety refuses to sign warrants for light furnished, on the ground that the contract has not been complied with, the relator cannot compel him to do so by mandamus, it having a remedy in the usual course of law by means of a suit to recover its claim, in which the dispute between the parties may be determined. Kensington Electric Co. v. Philadelphia (1898) 187 Pa. 446, 41 Atl. 309.

And in Padavano v. Fagan (1901) 66 N. J. L. 167, 48 Atl. 998, where the mayor interposed the defense to an action to compel the issuance of a warrant for the payment of a claim for removing ashes and garbage, that the resolution passed by the function, however, it has been held that, where the illegality<sup>21</sup> or irregularity<sup>22</sup> of the proceedings had in connection with the claim appears on the face of papers which it is the duty of the officer to examine before issuing the warrant, he may properly refuse to issue or sign it. And the same is true where his information with respect to the illegality or irregularity is based upon his personal knowledge that he has not performed certain acts prerequisite to the allowance of the claim.<sup>23</sup>

Where formalities in the presentation of a claim have been waived, their lack cannot be considered as a defense to an action to compel the issuance or signing of the warrant.<sup>24</sup>

IV. Existence of other adequate remedy.

The general rule that mandamus will not lie where the party seeking it has an adequate remedy by ordinary action is applicable to actions to compel a municipal officer to issue a warrant.<sup>25</sup> In California the party must have a remedy which is not only adequate but also equally as convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus.<sup>26</sup>

The courts are practically unanimous in holding that an action against the city council containing the claim had not been presented for his signature, mandamus is refused on the ground that the relator must establish his right to the money in a proceeding in which the city might present a defense.

<sup>21</sup> Where the council had no authority to direct the drawing of the order which relator is suing to compel defendant to countersign, and the illegality of the proceedings appears upon the face of the resolution and the order, "the court should not exercise its mandatory power to compel the performance of an act having only that illegal object" of procuring payment in view. State ex rel. Waitt v. Hill (1884) 32 Minn. 275, 20 N. W. 196.

<sup>22</sup> In State, Berry, Prosecutor, v. Daly (1888) 50 N. J. L. 356, 13 Atl. 6, where the claim had been audited and approved by the council, but the jurat made by relator upon the presentation of his claim had not been signed by the treasurer, mandamus to compel the mayor to sign the warrant was refused.

<sup>23</sup> In State ex rel. Seiter v. Hoffman (1874) 25 Ohio St. 328, an action by the superintendent of street improvements to compel the issuance of a warrant for his salary, where the auditor defends upon the ground that he has not certified to the council the existence of funds to pay such claim, as required by statute before the ordinance authorizing the expenditure can go into effect, it is held that mandamus will be refused to compel the issuance of the warrant.

<sup>24</sup> Where formalities in the presentation of a claim for services as night watchman and deputy marshal have been waived by the village council and the claim allowed, the president of the village cannot assign the lack of such formalities as a defense in an action to compel him to sign an order of payment. Kriseler v. Le Valley (1900) 122 Mich. 576, 81 N. W. 580.

And in Clapp v. Titus (1904) 138 Mich. 41, 100 N. W. 1005, an action by a village officer to compel the president of the village to sign orders for salary voted by the council, where the president did not put his refusal upon the failure to observe certain formalities in the presentation of the ac-L.R.A.1916D.

count, it is held that such failure will not render mandamus improper.

But in State ex rel. Wunderlich v. Kallofen (1907) 134 Wis. 74, 113 N. W. 1091, an action to compel a town board to issue an order for the payment of a claim allowed in a town meeting, it is said: "That where one's claim against a municipality has been allowed and nothing remains to be done to enable him to obtain his pay but to issue to him the proper warrant on the municipal treasury, he may proceed by mandamus to compel its issuance in case of a refusal to do so, notwithstanding he may also, if he chooses, proceed by action, is not an open question." And, quoting from an earlier case, the court continues: "Generally, the enforcement of a debt or contract right to money against a public corporation must be by the ordinary processes of an action; but when all the purposes of such an action are accomplished by the voluntary act of the corporate body in conceding the debt and ordering payment, and the only obstacle is the refusal or neglect of some officer to perform a ministerial duty, the creditor need not be driven to take the steps which would otherwise be necessary to establish his right against the corporation, but may have a writ against the individual officer to compel performance."

<sup>26</sup> It is said in Raisch v. Board of Education (1889) 81 Cal. 542, 22 Pac. 890, that "it has been held in this state that to supersede the remedy by mandamus, the party must not only have a specific, adequate, legal remedy, but one competent to afford relief upon the very subject-matter of his application, and one which is equally convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus."

And it is said in Ross v. Board of Education (1912) 18 Cal. App. 222, 122 Pac. 967, that "the general rule that mandamus will not lie where any other remedy is provided is subject to the qualification that mandamus may be invoked in those cases where the remedy by any other form of action or proceeding would not be equally as convenient, beneficial, and effective."

on the claim is not adequate within the meaning of the term as used in this connection.<sup>27</sup> Such an action is not against the same party, does not afford the same relief, as mandamus, and, in the absence of a statute providing some other means of enforcing a judgment against a municipality, leaves the holder of the claim still in need of a warrant and at the mercy of the same officer who now refuses to issue one. In a few cases, however, such an action against the city has been held adequate and the writ denied.<sup>28</sup> And this course seems to be beyond criticism where the holder of a judgment against a city may

See also Wood v. Strother (1888) 76 Cal. 545, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, 18 Pac. 766, supra, 11.

So, an ordinary civil action against the city on a bill for printing is held in State ex rel. Minneapolis Tribune Co. v. Ames (1884) 31 Minn. 440, 18 N. W. 277, to be neither speedy nor adequate as compared with mandamus. Upon recovering a judgment against the city, the court says that "it would be necessary for [relator] to present its claim to the comptroller and the council, to obtain an appropriation for its payment upon an order which must be signed by the mayor, or to wait until a tax could be levied to pay it." Such procedure would not, it is held, "afford the relator the particular right which the law accords him, viz., to have a properly authenticated order or warrant upon the treasurer as an evidence of indebtedness, and as a means of securing prompt payment of his claim out of the funds in the city treasury."

And in State ex rel. Ahrens v. Fiedler (1881) 43 N. J. L. 400, an action to compel the mayor to sign a warrant issued on relator's claim for the filling of lots, an action against the city was held inadequate within the meaning of the rule. "A judgment would not advance his claim beyond its present status," says the court. "It would fix the liability of the city and determine the amount due. The resolution of appropriation has already fixed the liability and determined the amount. The injury to relator is solely from defendant's refusal to do this ministerial act."

It is no adequate remedy on behalf of employees of a house of refuge to whom the city auditor refuses to issue warrants for their salary, that they may bring an action therefor against the city. State ex rel. Mix v. Cleveland (1889) 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 571. "It would be far from being an adequate remedy, that every month when the salaries become due, a large number of claimants, each of them, must have his suit L.R.A.1916D.

at law for the recovery of his salary," is the way the court puts it.

Where warrants for sums due for supplies furnished a library board had been intrusted to the librarian, who presented them to the city treasurer and absconded with the money received, it is held in Robertson v. Alameda Free Public Library (1902) 136 Cal. 403, 69 Pac. 88, that a suit against the city or the treasurer is not a "plain, speedy, or adequate remedy."

And so, in People ex rel. New York & H. R. Co. v. Havemeyer (1874) 3 Hun (N. Y.) 97, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 219, 47 How. Pr. 494, an action by a railroad to compel the mayor to sign a warrant for the city's share of the cost of an improvement, it is held that an action against the city for the amount due would not be an adequate remedy.

Mandamus is said, in Kendall v. Raybaud (1896) 13 Utah, 226, 44 Pac. 1034, to be "the only plain, speedy, and adequate remedy" to compel an auditor to issue a warrant for the payment of a salary due the inspector of provisions.

And in cases where policemen have sought to maintain actions against the city for their services, it has been held that their remedy is by mandamus to compel the board of police commissioners to issue the proper warrants. Sanford v. Kansas City (1879) 69 Mo. 466; Riley v. Kansas City (1888) 31 Mo. App. 439.

<sup>28</sup> In Holmes v. Brown (1908) 18 Manitoba L. R. 48, an action to compel the mayor to sign a check for the amount of a claim against the city, it is held that the plaintiffs have an adequate remedy by way of an action against the city; "and the mere fact that the other remedy is not against the defendant in the mandamus proceeding does not prevent the rule applying."

So, in Re Whitaker (1890) 18 Ont. Rep. 63, an application for a mandamus commanding the mayor to sign warrants for payment to the applicant of his salary as chief constable, it is held that the applicant has a claim for services against the town, and that his proper remedy is by suit.

And in People ex rel. Green v. Wood (1862) 13 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 374, 35 Barb. 653, 22 How. Pr. 286, an action to compel the mayor to countersign a warrant for a claim for the removal of offal from the city streets, it is held that the relator has an action against the city, and that he has, therefore, no right to mandamus.

It is held in Farr v. St. Johnsbury (1901) 73 Vt. 42, 50 Atl. 548, that the owner of a claim against a town for the destruction of a spring by the excavation of the base-levy execution upon the private estate of any inhabitant of the city.<sup>28a</sup>

And it has been held that an action against the officers refusing to draw the warrant, for neglect of duty<sup>29</sup> or breach of contract,<sup>30</sup> is not an adequate remedy. But where the relator may proceed against such officers by attachment, the situation is not so clear and the courts are not in harmony.<sup>31</sup> ment for a school building has an "adequate remedy in an action at law" to recover it, and the writ is denied.

<sup>28a</sup> GEORGE S. CHATFIELD Co. v. REEVES, ante, 321, wherein it is held that the holder of a claim against a city for a tract of land sold to the city for school purposes may maintain a civil action for the recovery of his claim, and, judgment having been entered therefor, have an execution which he may satisfy by levying upon the private estate of any inhabitant of the city, and that, consequently, the holder of such a claim has an adequate remedy by an action at law, which will obviate the necessity for a writ of mandamus.

<sup>29</sup> In Raisch v. Board of Education (1889) 81 Cal. 542, 22 Pac. 890, an action to compel the board to draw a draft on the school fund of the city to pay for articles purchased under contract with plaintiff, it is held that, in view of the fact that the board had the power to pay only by drawing drafts on the school fund, its contract to pay must be construed to be one to draw drafts, and not to pay money directly, and that the only action accruing to plaintiff from the failure to draw such a draft was against the members of the board for neglect of duty. The existence of such a right of action was held not to bar the right to sue for mandamus, the court assigning as its reason that "such an action evidently would not have been equally convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus, since it would not have compelled the board to do what it had contracted to do, and what, as we have seen, official duty required it to do."

<sup>30</sup> In Ross v. Board of Education (1912) 18 Cal. App. 222, 122 Pac. 967, an action to compel the board to approve a demand on the school fund of the city for the payment of plaintiff's salary as storekeeper for the board, it is held that, in view of the fact that the board had the power to pay only by drawing drafts on the school fund, its contract to pay must be construed to be one to draw drafts, and not to pay money directly, and that any ordinary action which "plaintiff might have had against the defendants individually or as a board for breach of the contract would not be 'equally convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus, since it would not have compelled the board to do what it had contracted to do'."

V. Where title to office is in question.

Mandamus will not issue to compel the delivery or signing a warrant for a salary where there is a dispute as to the relator's title to the office.<sup>32</sup> This rule can be accounted for on two grounds. In the first place, quo warranto is the proper proceeding when the title to public office is involved. In the second place, (1855) 2 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 90, on the ground that, the superior court having ordered the comptroller to pay the judgment, the relator had a simple, direct, and effective remedy in that court by attachment.

But, on the other hand, it is held in Chapin v. Port Angeles (1903) 31 Wash. 535, 72 Pac. 117, that the remedy prescribed by a statute providing that attachment may issue against the officer of a corporation who fails to satisfy a judgment is not adequate where a judgment creditor is seeking to compel the issuance of warrants for the payment of his claim.

<sup>32</sup> In State ex rel. Simmons v. John (1883) 81 Mo. 13, defendant refused to sign a warrant because it had been drawn by a person whom he alleged not to be the registrar and treasurer of the city. A dispute as to the proper incumbent of that office was involved. The court said: "The right to an office cannot be determined in a proceeding by mandamus to compel the payment of salary to a person claiming such office, or in a proceeding like the present, to compel the performance of official duty alleged to be obligatory by reason of the official character of such claimant. In such cases he who has the better prima facie right must be recognized, until, by contesting the election or by proceedings in quo warranto, the rights of the parties are finally determined." The writ was refused on the ground that the person who had drawn the warrant did not have prima facie right to the office.

And in State ex rel. Goodnow v. Police Comrs. (1899) 80 Mo. App. 206, an action to compel the issuance of warrants for salary earned after relator's discharge from the police force, in which relator urged, as his ground for transfer of the case to the supreme court, that the title to an office was involved, it is said that "if it involves the title, then the relator should be denied the writ, since mandamus is not a proper proceeding in such cases." The case subsequently came before the supreme court and that court held that the relator was not entitled to the writ, for the reason that his discharge was lawful. (1902) 184 Mo. 109, 71 S. W. 215, 88 S. W. 27.

In Davenport v. Los Angeles (1905) 146 Cal. 508, 80 Pac. 684, however, an action by a councilman who had not been allowed to take his seat, to determine his right thereto and to compel the auditor to draw a warrant for the salary due him, mandamus with respect to the warrant was issued. But in this case, although the principal re-as has been pointed out above,<sup>33</sup> the writ will be denied when the existence of a possible defense is made to appear.

VI. Effect of lack of funds.

Upon the question of the effect of the lack of funds with which to pay the warrants sought, upon the right of the holder of a claim to compel the issuance of the warrants, the courts are about equally divided. One group of courts takes the position that, without funds out of which he can demand payment, the warrant would be useless to the relator, and that he is not therefore entitled to the writ.<sup>34</sup> Other courts, however, take the opposite view, and hold the lack of funds to be immaterial.<sup>35</sup>

But where the payment of warrants is provided for not only out of a specific fund, but by some other means, such as the receipt thereof as taxes,<sup>36</sup> the existence of such a fund must be looked upon as immaterial, regardless of the position taken by the court, in the absence of such other means.

VII. Right to writ upon assigned claim.

No sufficient reason is apparent why, as a general rule, the ordinary principle that an assignee may bring suit upon the assigned claim does not extend to mandamus to compel the issuance of a warrant. But where the body which passes upon claims against the city has authorized the payment of the claim in the name of the assignor, it has been held that the assignee cannot compel the issuance of a warrant in his name.<sup>37</sup> And where the assignment is void, mandamus will, of course, lie by the assignor to compel the issuance of a warrant to himself.<sup>38</sup> lied sought was a determination of relator's right to the office, the court made no objection to the use of mandamus for that purpose. If mandamus is proper for that purpose, one of the objections to its use to compel the issuance of a warrant where there is a dispute as to relator's title to office is removed.

<sup>34</sup> In Board of Improvement v. McManus (1891) 54 Ark. 446, 15 S. W. 897, an action by a judgment creditor against the board to compel the issuance of a warrant on the treasurer of the board, where the board answered that there were no funds in the treasury, the court said: "The creditor of the board is entitled to a warrant only as a means to collect his claim, and whenever the court would be authorized to order the principal act of payment, it could order the issuance of the warrant as an incident; but the court could not order payment in this case, because such order could not be obeyed."

And in Sherman v. Smith (1896) 12 Tex. Civ. App. 580, 35 S. W. 294, where the city's levy of taxes for general purposes had reached the maximum constitutional limit, and the taxes so levied and all available funds were required for its maintenance, mandamus was refused to compel the issuance of a warrant on a judgment rendered upon a tort.

In State ex rel. Lynne v. Calhoun (1875) 27 La. Ann. 167, an action by a judgment creditor to compel the issuance of warrants, the court held that there was no right of mandamus in plaintiff, inasmuch as he had failed to prove his allegations that there was, at the time of making his demand, money in the city treasury specially designated and set apart for the payment of judgments.

<sup>35</sup> It is said in McEvers v. Boyle (1914) 25 Cal. App. 476, 144 Pac. 308, an action by a deputy sealer of weights and measures to compel the issuance of warrants for his salary, that "for the purpose of this inquiry it is immaterial whether there are or not" funds in the treasury of the city applicable to the payment of the warrants demanded.

And see Scott v. Boyle (1914) 25 Cal. App. 806, 149 Pac. 311, which involved similar facts, and which was decided upon the authority of the preceding case.

So, it is held in State v. Hoffman (1880) 35 Ohio St. 435, that in a proceeding to compel the auditor to issue a warrant, it is not material to inquire whether or not there is sufficient money in the city treasury to pay it.

<sup>36</sup> In Little Rock v. United States (1900) 43 C. C. A. 261, 103 Fed. 418, it is held that, inasmuch as the warrants issued by cities in Arkansas may be paid not only by the appropriation of money, but also by their receipt as taxes, the lack of funds with which to pay certain warrants is no defense to an action of mandamus to compel the mayor, clerk, and city council to issue and deliver them.

<sup>37</sup> Scheerer v. Edgar (1888) 76 Cal. 569, 18 Pac. 681, was an action by the assignee of a judgment against the city and county of San Francisco. The board of supervisors had authorized the payment of the judgment in the name of the original holder thereof, and the auditor had drawn a warrant in his name. Admitting that the auditor had notice of the assignment before he drew such warrant, the court held that he had no authority, and could not be compelled by mandamus, to draw a warrant in favor of the assignee. While admitting the auditor's right to disobey an illegal order, the court holds it "to be beyond his power to substitute his own affirmative action for that of the board as to matters within their jurisdiction."

VIII. Effect of appeal from claim.

Until the holder of the claim is finally adjudged to have a clear legal right thereto, he is not entitled to mandamus.<sup>39</sup> Therefore, it has been held that, during an appeal from the allowance of a claim made by a city board, mandamus will not lie to compel the delivery of a warrant.<sup>40</sup>

<sup>40</sup> In Lobeck v. State (1904) 72 Neb. 595, 101 N. W. 247, a company which was doing street repairing for the city was suing to compel the comptroller of the city to deliver a warrant for the amount of an estimate allowed by the board of public works, the mayor, and the council, with respect to which, however, an appeal by a taxpayer was pending. The court held that "the effect of the appeal was to at least suspend the order of the board during its pendency, and while the case was pending and undisposed of in the district court mandamus would not lie to compel the delivery of the warrant."

Action to recover damages for injury to cattle and depreciation in value due to a failure on the part of the company to transport and deliver them at their destination within a reasonable time. Defense interposed, that the action was not brought within the time provided in the contract, and that no notice of the injury or damage was served upon the defendant before said stock was removed from the destination and mingled with other stock, as required by the terms of the contract of shipment or bill of lading. Gaynor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the month of March, 1912, the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant company at St. Paul, Minnesota, five loads of cattle to be transported over defendant's lines to certain points in Iowa. Certain carloads were consigned to J. W. Riggs, Douds, Iowa, and certain carloads to J. A. Baldwin, at Selma, Iowa. It is claimed by the plaintiffs that the defendant was negligent in transporting said cattle, and the same were unreasonably delayed in transit, and were neglected and uncared for during transportation; that by reason thereof the cattle were damaged when they arrived at their destination; that two of the cattle were dead, and others were rendered worthless, or practically so; that all the cattle were damaged more or less. Upon this alleged negligence, the plaintiffs ask recovery of the defendant in sum of $589 on the first count of their petition.

The record discloses that on January 13, 1913, the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant company at Selma, Iowa, certain fat cattle to be transported by said company over its lines to the stock yards in Chicago, Illinois. The plaintiffs claim that the cattle were unreasonably delayed in transit through the negligence of the defendant; that if said cattle had been transported with reasonable diligence, they would have arrived in Chicago in time for the Wednesday market, January 15th; that they did not arrive at the stock yards until 6:30 P. M. Wednesday, too late for that day's market; that by reason of the delay in transportation the cattle were depreciated, and were bruised and injured by reason of the long confinement, and when delivered were in a weakened, sickened, and stunted condition, and their value impaired. For the purposes of this case we may assume that these allegations are true, and that the plaintiffs suffered damage substantially as claimed by them, and that such damage was the proximate result of defendant's negligence.

The defendant answers plaintiffs' petition, and admits that it received the cattle for transportation to the various stations mentioned by the plaintiffs, but says that at the time it received the cattle for shipment, the plaintiffs entered into a written contract covering the transportation of the cattle, which, so far as material to this controversy, reads as follows: "That as a condition precedent to claiming or recovering damages for any loss or injury to or detention of live stock, or delay in transportation thereof, covered by this contract, the second party, as soon as he discovers such loss or injury, shall promptly give notice thereof in writing to some general officer, claim agent, or station agent of the first party, or to the agent at destination, or to some general officer of the delivering line, before such stock is removed from the point of shipment, or from the place of destination, as the case may be, and before such stock is mingled with other stock; and such written notice shall in any event be served within one day after delivery of the stock at its destination, in order that such claim may be fully and fairly investigated. It is agreed that a failure to strictly comply with all the foregoing provisions shall be a bar to the recovery of any and all of such claims."

With the further provision: "That no suit or action against the first party for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this contract shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity, unless such suit or action be commenced within six months next after the cause of action shall occur; and, should any suit or action be commenced against the first party after the expiration of six months, the lapse of time shall be constituted conclusive evidence against the validity of such claim, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding."

was signed by both the plaintiffs and the defendant company, and constitutes the bill of lading or contract under which the cattle were shipped. At the time the shipments were made, the company had two tariff rates on cattle,—one rate where the shipment was made with a limitation as to the amount of recovery in case of loss; a higher rate where the shipment was made without limitation. These cattle, it appears, were shipped at the lower tariff rate. These tariff rates had been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified to by the secretary. One of these tariff rates was introduced in evidence and known as the Western Trunk Line Circular, and provided:

"Live stock—limitation of liability.

"Rates on live stock published in tariffs will apply on shipments made at owner's risk, with a limitation of liability on the part of the railroad company as a common carrier, under the terms and conditions of the current live stock contract provided by said company; the contract to be first duly executed in the manner and form provided for therein. On shipments made without limitation of carrier's liability at common law, not less than 150 per cent of the rate named will be charged, and, under this status, shippers will have the choice of executing and accepting the contract for shipment of live stock with or without limitation of liability, the rates to be made as provided for herein."

It was shown that this provision in the Western Trunk Line Circular was in effect and applied on the shipments that were made to the Union Stock Yards, Chicago, Illinois, as well as to the other shipments. It is conceded that no notice of the alleged injury to the stock was even given the defendant prior to the commencement of the action. The action was commenced on the 13th day of March, 1913.

As to the first count of plaintiffs' petition, it is clear that if the provision of the contract relied upon was one which, under the law, the parties had a right to enter into, and one that was binding upon both parties, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, for it appears that the action was not commenced for nearly a year after the alleged damage, and that no notice was given, as required by the contract.

These were interstate shipments, and therefore governed, not by the laws of this state, but by the acts of Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and it follows that § 2074 of the Code of 1897 does not apply. We are cited by the plaintiffs both to this section and to the case of Cramer v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 153 Iowa, 111, 133 N. W. 387.

The Cramer Case, however, was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. 232 U. S. 490, 58 L. ed. 697, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383. See Heilman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 167 Iowa, 313, 149 N. W. 436.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Harriman, 227 U. S. 657, 57 L. ed. 690, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397, the Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to pass upon the exact question that is here presented, so far as the first count of plaintiffs' petition is concerned. In that case, which went from Missouri, the stipulation in the shipping contract provided that no suit should be brought after the lapse of ninety days after the happening of any loss or damage. The Supreme Court said: "It is conceded that there are statutes in Missouri, the state of the making of the contract, and the state in which the loss and damage occurred, and in Texas, the state of the forum, which declare contracts invalid which require the bringing of an action for a carrier's liability in less than the statutory period, and that this action, though started after the lapse of the time fixed by the contract, was brought within the statutory period of both states. The liability sought to be enforced is the 'liability' of an interstate carrier for loss or damage under an interstate contract of shipment, declared by the Carmack amendment of the Hepburn act of June 29, 1906 [chapter 3591, § 7, §§ 11, 12, 34 Stat. at L. 595, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8592]. The validity of any stipulation in such a contract which involves the construction of the statute, and the validity of a limitation upon the liability thereby imposed, is a Federal question, to be determined under the general common law, and, as such, is withdrawn from the field of state law or legislation. . . . The liability imposed by the statute is the liability imposed by the . . . special contract with the shipper, provided the limitation or qualification be just and reasonable, and does not exempt from loss or responsibility due to negligence [citing authorities]. The policy of statutes of limitation is to encourage promptness in the bringing of actions, that the parties shall not suffer by loss of evidence from death or disappearance of witnesses, destruction of documents, or failure of memory. But there is nothing in the policy or object of such statutes which forbids the parties to an agreement to provide a shorter period, provided the time is not unreasonably short. That is a question of law for the determination of the court. Such stipulations have been sustained in insurance policies [citing cases]. A stipulation that an express company should not be held liable unless claim was made within ninety days after a loss was held good in L.R.A. 1916D.

Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. ed. 556. Such limitations in bills of lading are very customary and have been upheld in a multitude of cases [citing cases]. . . . The provision requiring suit to be brought within ninety days is not unreasonable."

It follows, therefore, that if ninety days is not an unreasonably short time in which to require actions to be instituted and prosecuted in cases of this kind, six months not only is not unreasonable, but must be held a reasonable restriction upon the right to maintain the action. This case is conclusive on plaintiffs' right to recover on the first count of his petition.

On the second count, involving the right of the plaintiffs to recover for the injury to the fat cattle shipped by it to the Union Stock Yards in January, 1913, it appears that this action was brought within six months, so the six months' limitation on the right to maintain the action is not involved in the determination of plaintiffs' rights under this count. It appears, however, that these cattle arrived at the Union Stock Yards at about 6:30 P. M. on Wednesday, the 15th, but too late for that day's market; that the market closed at 3 o'clock; that they were placed upon the market the next morning, and were sold and passed out of the control of the plaintiffs; that the injury to these cattle was discovered by the plaintiffs upon their arriving in Chicago; that no notice was given to the company, or to any of the agents of the company mentioned in the contract, at any time prior to the beginning of this action, or any claim filed for damages, or any notice given that the cattle were damaged or injured in transit, as required by the terms of the contract hereinbefore set out.

We are not prepared to say at this time, nor do we make any pronouncement, as to whether or not notice should be given within one day after the delivery of the stock at its destination. We make no pronouncement as to whether that is a reasonable time within which to require the notice to be given under all circumstances; but the provision of the contract requiring the plaintiffs to promptly give notice in writing to some general officer, claim agent, or station agent of the first party, or agent at destination, or to some general officer of the delivery line, before such stock is removed from the point of shipment or the place of destination, as the case may be, and before such stock is mingled with other stock, is a reasonable provision, and clearly the defendant was entitled to notice before these acts took place, the effect of which was to deprive defendant of an opportunity to examine the cattle and ascertain for itself whether or not the claim for damages was well founded.

This action was not commenced until nearly sixty days after the cattle had been disposed of by the plaintiffs, had passed out of their control, and were no longer subject to inspection by the defendant. This provision in principle is analogous to those provisions of the statute which provide for the giving of notice to a city of personal injury as a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action. We are not withholding authority on this question. See Clegg v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 122 C. C. A. 273, 203 Fed. 971. In that case the provision was substantially the same as the one now under consideration, and the court said: "We are clearly of the opinion that the eleventh provision in the contract above quoted, relative to giving notice, was a valid one, and the failure to give the notice fatal to plaintiff's right to recover,"—citing cases.

In Kidwell v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 125 C. C. A. 313, 208 Fed. 1, the United States circuit court of appeals had occasion to pass upon a similar question, and said: "A stipulation that notice of a claim for damages be given before the stock is removed or intermingled with other stock, as a condition precedent to recovery, is a reasonable one, and it has been so held by the supreme court of the state in which the contract in this case was made,"—citing authorities.

In Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. 264-272, 22 L. ed. 556-550, it was held: "An agreement that in case of failure by the carrier to deliver goods, he shall not be liable unless a claim shall be made by the bailor or by the consignee within a specified period, if that period be a reasonable one, is not against the [public] policy of the law, and is valid."

In that case it is said: "It may be remarked . . . that the stipulation is not a conventional limitation of the right of the carrier's employer to sue. He is left at liberty to sue at any time within the period fixed by the statute of limitations. He is only required to make his claim within ninety days, in season to enable the carrier to ascertain what the facts are, and, having made his claim, he may delay his suit. . . . A common carrier is always responsible for his negligence, no matter what his stipulations may be. But an agreement that, in case of failure by the carrier to deliver the goods, a claim shall be made by the bailor or by the consignee within a specified period, if that period be a reasonable one, is altogether of a different character. It contravenes no public policy. It excuses no negligence. It is perfectly consistent with holding the carrier to the fullest measure of good faith, of diligence, and of capacity, which the strictest rules of the common law ever required."

It is further said: "If a bailor may delay giving notice to them of a loss, or making a claim indefinitely, they may not be able to trace the parcels bailed, and to recover them, if accidentally misssent, or if they have in fact been properly delivered. With the bailor the bailment is a single transaction, of which he has full knowledge; with the bailee, it is one of a multitude. There is no hardship in requiring the bailor to give notice of the loss, if any, or make a claim for compensation within a reasonable time after he has delivered the parcel to the carrier. There is great hardship in requiring the carrier to account for the parcel long after that time, when he has had no notice of any failure of duty on his part, and when the lapse of time has made it difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the actual facts. For these reasons such limitations have been held valid in similar contracts, even when they seem to be less reasonable than in the contracts of common carriers."

A limitation of this character was also held binding upon the parties, and not unreasonable, and not in contravention of the policy of the law, in Spada v. Pennsylvania R. Co., by court of errors and appeals of New Jersey, reported in 86 N. J. L. 187, 92 Atl. 379. It seems to us the only question that can be made is as to the reasonableness of the time fixed in the contract in which the notice is required to be given. In the Clegg Case, supra, 122 C. C. A. 273, 203 Fed. 971, the contract was in all respects the same as the contract here under consideration as to the requirement touching notice, and it was held to be reasonable. In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Kirkham, 63 Kan. 255, 65 Pac. 261, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 263, the provision in the shipping contract was: "The shipper further expressly agrees that, as a condition precedent to his right to recover any damages for any loss or injury to . . . cattle resulting from carrier's negligence as aforesaid, including delays, he will give notice in writing to the conductor in charge of the train, or the nearest station or freight agent of the carrier on whose line the injuries occur, before said cars leave that carrier's line, or before the cattle are mingled with other cattle, or removed from pens at destination. In his notice he shall state place and nature of the injuries complained of, to the end that they may be fully and fairly investigated; and said shipper shall, within thirty days after the happening of the injuries complained of, file with some freight or station agent of the carrier on whose line the injury occurred his claim therefor, giving the amount. Shipper's failure to comply with the requirements of this section shall absolutely defeat and bar any cause of action for any injuries resulting to said cattle, as aforesaid. . . . No agent of this company has any authority to waive, modify, or amend any of the provisions of this contract.' . . . No notice or claim of damages was made to the conductor in charge of the train at Burlington, or to the station agent at said place, until the following day, and until the cattle had been removed from the pens at point of destination."

The court said: "Live stock contracts similar in their nature to the one here involved have received the consideration of this court, and where fairly entered into by both parties, in the absence of fraud, have been held conclusive and binding upon the parties [citing cases]. Hence it must be held that the terms and conditions of this special contract were binding upon these parties, and should have been so declared by the court."

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Phillips, 17 Okla. 264, 87 Pac. 470, the provision in the contract was: "No carrier shall be responsible for loss or damage of any of the freight shipped, unless it is proved to have occurred during the time of its transit over the particular carrier's line, and of this notice must be given within thirty hours after the arrival of the same at destination."

It was further provided in the shipping contract or bill of lading: "That as a condition precedent to a recovery for any damages for delay, loss, or injury to live stock covered by this contract, the second party will give notice in writing of the claim therefor to some general officer or nearest station agent of the first party, or to the agent at destination, or to some general officer of the delivering line, before such stock is removed from the point of shipment, or from the place of destination, and before such stock is mingled with other stock; such written notification to be served within one day of the delivery of such stock at destination, to the end that such claim shall be fully and fairly investigated."

And it was provided that a failure to comply with the provisions of this clause shall be a bar to the recovery of any and all damages. The court said: "Now the proposition presents itself: Was this provision of the bill of lading and shipping contract a reasonable one, and one which the law would enforce? The validity of a contract of this nature, and of this special provision requiring notice in writing to be given of the loss or injury within a reasonable time as a condition precedent to the shipper's right of action, has been so repeatedly and often supported by the decisions of the various courts of this country as to become a well-recognized and settled rule of law."

And it was held that this provision was a valid, binding contract on the plaintiff, and that a failure to comply with it defeated his right to recover.

In the case of Texas C. R. Co. v. Morris, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 158, it was held that a railroad company may, by special contract, require a shipper of cattle to serve a written notice of a claim for damages for loss or injury to the cattle while in transit, before the cattle are removed from the place of delivery and mingled with other stock, as a condition precedent to his right to recover for such damages. The same was held in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Crittenden, 4 Kan. App. 512, 44 Pac. 1000, in which the court, in passing upon a contract similar to the one under consideration, says: "So far as it required the shipper to give notice in writing of his loss or injury, it is a valid, binding contract. By its terms Crittenden was compelled to give notice in writing to the company of his claim for loss or injury to said stock before the stock was removed from the place of destination or delivery, and before said stock was mingled with other stock. Failing to comply with the terms of the contract, he cannot recover."

. . . These provisions of the contract are just and equitable. The company is entitled to a written notice that the shipper claims damages, so as to permit the company to have a thorough investigation made of the nature of the claim and the condition of the stock before the stock is removed from its premises, or before it is mingled with other stock so as to render its identification difficult. . . . The shipper must prove such notice to have been given before he can recover."

There are other questions discussed by counsel, but as the provisions of this contract are binding upon the parties and control their rights, and inasmuch as there was no attempt made on the part of the plaintiffs to perform any of these conditions precedent to its right to recover, we must hold, under the authorities herein cited, that the District Court was right in directing a verdict for the defendant as it did in this case, and the cause is therefore affirmed.

Annotation—Reasonableness of the time fixed in a contract of shipment of live stock, for presentation of claim for damages.

This is a continuation of the note to Wabash R. Co. v. Thomas, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1041.

These notes presuppose that a stipulation in a carrier's contract limiting the time for the presentation of claims for damages is valid if it allows a reasonable time. This assumption, it may be observed, is in accordance with the Federal rule as to interstate shipments, which, as shown by the notes to Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 257, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 819, have been removed from the operation of state laws on the subject. Intrastate shipments, of course, remain subject to local laws. In this connection, see notes—

—as to validity of contract limiting time for bringing action or for presentation of claims for damages, where statute or Constitution prohibits carrier from limiting its common-law liability, in Liquid Carbonic Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 753;

—as to validity of stipulations in carrier's contract requiring notice of loss within a specified time, as applied to loss due to carrier's negligence, in Houtz v. Union P. R. Co. 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 628;

—as to notice of loss or injury to goods required by carrier's contract as a condition precedent, in Hoye v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 642;

—as to removal of live stock from carrier's premises before notice of claim for damages, where such notice is given in time for examination, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Davis, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 866.

As stated in 4 R. C. L. § 253, the one essential of stipulations of this nature is that they be reasonable. This is, however, purely relative, and a stipulation perfectly reasonable under one state of facts would be quite as unreasonable under another. Whether in any particular case the stipulation under consideration is valid is therefore dependent on the peculiar facts and circumstances of that case, the chief query being whether sufficient time has been given to enable the shipper to discover the loss and give notice thereof, this again being largely dependent on distance and the facilities of communication. From the very nature of such a requirement it is evident that no helpful, general rule can be laid down.

As shown in the note in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1041, the courts not infrequently determine the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the time allowed by the stipulation with reference to the actual facts as they afterwards developed.

And numerous cases have upheld as reasonable a provision in a contract of shipment requiring, as a condition precedent to a recovery of damages for injuries to live stock, that the shipper give notice in writing of the claim therefor to some general officer or station agent at the nearest station, before such stock is removed or mingled with other stock, such notice to be served within one day after delivery of the stock at destination. Clegg v. A. R. Co. v. Ward (1914) 111 Ark. 102, 163 S. W. 164 (intrastate); Anll v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1909) 136 Mo. App. 291, 116 S. W. 1122 (intrastate); Moore v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1910) 143 Mo. App. 675, 127 S. W. 921 (interstate); McElvain v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1913) 176 Mo. App. 379, 158 S. W. 464, later appeal (1915) — Mo. App. —, 180 S. W. 1018 (interstate); Sims v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1914) 177 Mo. App. 18, 163 S. W. 275 (interstate); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Young (1912) 30 Okla. 588, 120 Pac. 999 (interstate); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Ladd (1912) 33 Okla. 160, 124 Pac. 461 (interstate).

So, in Riddler v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1914) 184 Mo. App. 709, 171 S. W. 632, the court, observing that the question as to the reasonableness of the time depends on the character of the shipment, the situation of the parties, and the circumstances of each particular case, held that the period of one day allowed by a stipulation in an interstate contract as to live stock, requiring notice within one day after delivery of the stock at destination and before such stock was removed, was not unreasonable, it appearing that the consignee saw at once that the cattle were stale and in poor condition on account of being held over, and that the time limited did not expire until more than two hours after the cattle had been sold on the market.

The same stipulation was, in Shelton v.

St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1908) 131 Mo. App. 560, 110 S. W. 627, upheld as reasonable, the facts regarding the failure to give notice within the stated time being insufficient to suggest its application as unreasonable, and nothing being done until some days after the stock was actually unloaded by shipper's agents, commingled with other stock of the same kind, and sold upon the market.

But the requirement of notice within one day after delivery at destination and before the stock is mingled with other stock has been held unreasonable where the loss or damage could not be ascertained within the limited time. Eoff v. Scullin (1915) — Ark. —, 179 S. W. 663 (interstate); McKinstrey v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1911) 153 Mo. App. 546, 134 S. W. 1061 (interstate); Pierson v. Northern P. R. Co. (1911) 61 Wash. 450, 112 Pac. 509 (intrastate).

So, a stipulation requiring notice of claim within one day after delivery of live stock at destination and before mingling them with other stock is held unreasonable and contrary to statute in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hinds (1912) 9 Ala. App. 534, 60 So. 409 (interstate). See also Northern Alabama R. Co. v. Bidgood (1912) 5 Ala. App. 658, 59 So. 680 (intrastate).

So, a stipulation for the presentation of a claim within five days after the unloading of stock is unreasonable where the damage cannot be ascertained within that time. Crawford v. Southern R. Co. (1915) 101 S. C. 522, 86 S. E. 19 (interstate).

And in Williams v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (1908) 93 Miss. 77, 46 So. 399 (interstate), the court stated that it was very questionable if the time (ten days after arrival of shipment of mules) could be in any case upheld as a reasonable regulation.

Where stock was billed through to a certain town, a provision requiring written notification of injuries to be given to the carrier at another town en route was, in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Dunn (1910) 94 Ark. 407, 127 S. W. 464 (intrastate), held unreasonable, the carrier having no opportunity to ascertain the full extent of the injury to the stock until unloaded at final destination.

If a shipper cannot give notice within ten days from the time the stock is removed from the cars, because of his inability to ascertain the damage, he should exercise diligence and give notice L.R.A.1916D.

within a reasonable time at least. Letts v. Wabash R. Co. (1908) 131 Mo. App. 270, 111 S. W. 138 (intrastate).

It was held in Holland v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1909) 139 Mo. App. 702, 123 S. W. 987, that the failure of a shipper to give notice within twenty-seven days after delivery of cattle at destination, where he could not ascertain the damage before that time, would not defeat recovery where he kept the cattle separate and gave the carrier an opportunity to investigate, although the contract called for notice within a day after delivery at destination.

The contract in Pecos & N. T. R. Co. v. Evans-Snyder-Buel Co. (1906) 42 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 93 S. W. 1024 (interstate), provided that, as a condition precedent to the shipper's right to recover damages for loss or injury to stock during transportation, he or his agent in charge should give notice in writing of his claim to the nearest station agent, or if the stock is delivered to consignee at a point beyond the company's road, to the nearest station agent of the last carrier making such delivery, before such stock should be removed from the place of destination or from the place of delivery to the consignee, and before such stock should be slaughtered or intermingled with other stock, and that the shipper should not move the stock from the station or stock yards until the expiration of three hours after the giving of the notice; and a failure to comply in every respect with the terms of the contract should be a complete bar to recovery; the written notice provided for in the contract could not and should not be waived by any person except a general officer of the company, and by him only in writing; nor should any such damage be recoverable unless written claim therefor should be presented to the company within ninety-one days after the same may have occurred; it was held that the requirements were so interdependent as to be inseparable, and as a whole they were unreasonable and void. The above case was affirmed in (1906) 100 Tex. 190, 97 S. W. 466, without reference to the question under discussion.

In Deans v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1910) 152 N. C. 171, 67 S. E. 332 (interstate), a stipulation requiring written notice of loss within thirty days after arrival, to the agent at the point of delivery, was held unreasonable, but an instruction that notice within sixty days would be reasonable was held not error. The court observed that the standard bill of lading adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1908, prescribing four months as the time limit in which claims for loss were to be made, was not adopted until two years after the shipment in the present case.

There are many cases which have held or assumed the time allowed to be reasonable, and the stipulation therefor valid, without expressly making the question of unreasonableness turn upon the facts of the particular case as they afterwards developed, though it may be said that it did not appear in these cases that the time allowed was unreasonable tested by such facts. In this class of cases (supplementing those in 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1042) a notice within the following periods has been held or assumed to be reasonable:

—within five hours after the stock was unloaded, Bowman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1914) 185 Mo. App. 25, 171 S. W. 642 (interstate);

—within one day after delivery at destination, Smith v. St. Louis & S. W. R. Co. (1914) 186 Mo. App. 401, 171 S. W. 635 (interstate);

—within five days after unloading at destination, Hamilton v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1913) 177 Mo. App. 145, 164 S. W. 248 (interstate); Dunlap v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1914) 187 Mo. App. 201, 172 S. W. 1178 (interstate);

—within ten days after stock is unloaded, Armstrong v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1913) 162 Ky. 539, 172 S. W. 947 (interstate);

—within ten days from date of unloading at destination and before mingling with other stock, Kidwell v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1913) 125 C. C. A. 313, 208 Fed. 1 (interstate); Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wade (1911) 1 Tenn. C. C. A. 780 (interstate); Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1914) 161 Ky. 783, 171 S. W. 442 (interstate); Frank Smith Meat Co. v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (1911) 59 Or. 206, 117 Pac. 303 (intrastate); —within thirty days after loss or damage occurred, Adams Exp. Co. v. Cook, (1915) 162 Ky. 592, 172 S. W. 1096 (interstate);

—within ninety-one days (probably from time of delivery), International & G. N. R. Co. v. Heittner (1906) 42 Tex. Civ. App. 617, 94 S. W. 189 (intrastate).

before the stock is moved from its place of destination or delivery, or is delivered to the consignee or mingled with other stock, hold or assume that such a stipulation is reasonable, and consequently valid, without showing that the reasonableness is or is not dependent upon the circumstances as they are finally developed in connection with the individual case. E. 264 (interstate); Baldwin v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1915) — N. C. —, 86 S. E. 776 (interstate); Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Brownsville Livery & Live Stock Co. (1910) 123 Tenn. 298, 130 S. W. 788 (interstate).

A stipulation in a contract of freightment of live stock, requiring the owner to give notice in writing of his claim for damages, to some officer of the company or its nearest station agent, before the stock is removed from the place of destination, is a reasonable stipulation, binding on the owner, and he cannot recover on failure to give such notice, though he did not go in person or send an agent with the stock, as in such case he should have sent a copy of the contract to the consignee in order that the latter might have complied with the stipulation. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Phillips (1906) 17 Okla. 264, 87 Pac. 470 (interstate).

Other cases where the contract contained stipulations of this character recognized more or less clearly the principle that the reasonableness of the requirement as to the time within which notice of claim for damages must be given is to be determined by the circumstances as they afterwards develop; and the validity or invalidity, as the case may be, of the contract, and its conclu-siveness upon the shipper, are determined according as the result shows that the shipper could or could not have reasonably given the notice so as to have accomplished the result aimed at by the stipulation,—namely, the prevention of fraud in the presentation of ungrounded claims. Thus, supplementing 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1043, the following intrastate shipment cases may be noted:

A stipulation requiring written notice of claim to some officer of the company or to the nearest station agent before the stock is removed or mingled with other stock will be upheld as reasonable in the absence of a showing that it works a hardship in the particular case. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Coffin (1910) 13 Ariz. 144, 108 Pac. 480. See also to the same effect: Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tharpe (1912) 11 Ga. App. 465, 75 S. E. 677 (interstate); Southern R. Co. v. Adams (1902) 115 Ga. 705, 42 S. E. 35 (interstate); Southern R. Co. v. Toller-son (1907) 129 Ga. 647, 59 S. E. 799 (interstate); BALDWIN v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. ante, 335 (interstate).

There are cases (supplementing 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1043) holding that a stipulation requiring notice before removal, although it may be reasonable as a general proposition, will not be held binding upon the shipper where it does not appear that there was an officer or station agent at the point of destination, or so situated that notice could be reasonably served upon him within the time stipulated.

Thus, in the following interstate shipment cases a stipulation requiring notice of claim within a certain time is deemed unreasonable in the absence of an agent upon whom service of notice could be made: Wall v. Northern P. R. Co. (1914) 50 Mont. 122, 145 Pac. 291; Hovey v. Tankersley (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 177 S. W. 153; Chicago, R. I. & G. R. Co. v. Whaley (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 177 S. W. 543.

So, in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Kimberlin (1908) 51 Tex. Civ. App. 124, 111 S. W. 671, it was held unreasonable to require notice of damages within one day after the delivery of the stock when that time was insufficient and the facts did not show that there was any agent at the place of delivery to whom to give notice.

So, a stipulation requiring notice to a general officer of the carrier before removal, and within five days after delivery of stock, has been held an unreasonable restriction upon the right to recover L.R.A.1916D.

damages, especially where the general claim agent was notified and the stock agent made an investigation. Jones Bros. v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co. (1906) 117 Mo. App. 523, 94 S. W. 735 (intrastate).

Where the delivery is to be made by a connecting carrier, numerous cases have held that if the carrier wishes to take advantage of the condition requiring notice to be given before the stock is removed from its place of destination, it must show that it had an officer or agent where the shipper could reasonably find him so as to give the required notice. See cases in note, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1044.

Generally, the reasonableness of a stipulation requiring the presentation of a notice of claim within a certain time is a question of fact. See cases in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1045.

So, where notice of claim was required to be given to an agent within one day after the delivery of the stock, and there was no agent nearer than 35 miles from the delivery point, the reasonableness of the limitation was held a question for the jury. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Furlow (1909) 89 Ark. 404, 117 S. W. 517.

So, whether the time provided within a contract for giving notice is reasonable or unreasonable is a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances of the case. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Phillips (1906) 17 Okla. 264, 87 Pac. 470; Arnold v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1908) 4 Ga. App. 519, 61 S. E. 1050.

So, a finding of the court that a stipulation requiring a shipper to give notice of loss within ten days after the unloading of the sheep was reasonable, where the answer contained no allegation, and there was no proof on the subject, is a mere conclusion of law, and will be treated as no finding on the subject, the question of reasonableness being one of fact. Houtz v. Union P. R. Co. (1908) 33 Utah, 175, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 628, 93 Pac. 439.

And it was a question for the jury in Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Curtis Bros. (1907) 44 Tex. Civ. App. 477, 99 S. W. 566, whether or not ninety-one days was a reasonable time under the circumstances presented.

While a clause in a contract for the shipment of live stock, providing that, as a condition precedent to the shipper's right to recover any damages for loss or injury, he should give notice in writing of his claim therefor before the animals are removed from the place of destination, and before they are mingled with other animals, is prima facie reasonable and binding, nevertheless it may be waived or rendered unreasonable and unenforceable in the particular case by the conduct of the carrier; and in Arnold v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ga.) supra, it was held a question for the jury as to whether the carrier, by refusing the shipper transportation on the freight train, and by unloading the stock into his agent's pens before he had time to inspect them, did not waive or render unreasonable in the particular case this clause of the contract.

And it is proper to instruct the jury as to what matters may be considered in determining what is a reasonable time to file claims for damages to a shipment of live stock. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hayes (1914) 181 Ind. 87, 104 N. E. 581.

But the submission to the jury of the reasonableness of a stipulation was in Crawford v. Southern R. Co. (1915) 101 S. C. 522, 86 S. E. 19, held error, where it was undisputed that the damage to the stock was not ascertainable within such time.

And where, from the nature of the injury alleged and proved to have been inflicted upon the cattle, it must have been apparent at once upon their arrival at destination that they were seriously damaged, and that there was nothing to prevent the shipper from making the necessary claim and giving the railroad company an opportunity to examine the live stock within the time and in the manner limited in the shipping contract, the question of the reasonableness of such a provision is a question of law for the court. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Ladd (1912) 33 Okla. 160, 124 Pac. 461. J. D. C.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Resp't.

Commerce — interstate shipments — Carmack amendment.

1. Under the Carmack amendment it was the clear intention of Congress to remove from the realm of state regulations and restrictions all contracts involving interstate shipments of freight and live stock.

For other cases, see Commerce, II. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Carrier — limitation of liability — Federal statute.

2. The liability imposed by the Federal statutes upon carriers of interstate shipments is the liability imposed by common law upon a common carrier, and such liability may be limited or qualified by special contract with the shipper, provided the limitation or qualification be just and reasonable, and does not exempt the carrier from liability due to its negligence.

For other cases, see Carriers, III. g, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Stutsman County in defendant's favor in an action upon a shipping contract brought to recover damages for alleged negligent injury to a shipment of live stock while in defendant's possession for transportation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Knauf & Knauf and S. E. Ellsworth, for appellant:

Defendant, by its long delay in pleading or in showing an intention to place any reliance upon the limitation clause in its contract, is conclusively deemed to have waived any benefits to be derived from the same in this action.

Fisk, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and appellant seeks to recover damages from defendant railway company upon a special contract entered into on March 9, 1907, for the transportation of certain horses and other property from the Minnesota Transfer to McHenry, in this state. He alleges in his complaint that through the negligence of the defendant in handling the car in which such horses were transported, and through unreasonable delay in transporting the car, such horses were greatly injured, which injury resulted in the death of several of the horses and permanent injuries to the remainder. This action was commenced in April, 1913, but in October, 1908, plaintiff brought an action to recover damages connected with this same shipment, basing his action, not on the contract, but upon the defendant's common-law liability. In such former litigation the defense interposed was that the parties had entered into a special contract governing such shipment, and that their rights and liabilities should be measured by such contract. Such defense was sustained both in the trial court and in this court. Cooke v. Northern P. R. Co. 22 N. D. 266, 133 N. W. 303. For a general statement of the facts we refer to the opinion in that case.

The contract in suit is the ordinary stock contract used by the defendant company, and contains, among other things, a statement that:

The shipment is made "at the published tariff rate which applies to shipments under a limited liability contract, the same being a reduced rate made upon the terms and conditions following, which are admitted and accepted by the undersigned shipper as just and reasonable, that is to say:" Then follow numerous stipulations, among which are the following:

"(3) And it is hereby further agreed that the value of the live stock to be transported under this contract does not exceed the following mentioned sums, to wit: Each horse, $75; each mule, $75; each stallion, $100; each jack, $100; each ox or steer, $50; each bull, $50; each cow, $30; each calf, $10; each pig, $10; each sheep or goat, $3; such valuation being that whereon the rate of compensation to said carrier for its services and risks connected with said property is based."

"(6) The said shipper further agrees that, as a condition precedent to his right to recover any damages for loss or injuries to any of said stock, he will give notice in writing of his claim therefor to some officer or station agent of the said company before said stock has been removed from the place of destination or mingled with other stock.

"(7) It is further agreed and provided that no suit or action to recover any damages for loss or injury to any of said stock, or for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this contract, shall be sustained by any court against said company, unless suit or action shall be commenced within sixty (60) days after the damage shall occur, and on any suit or action commenced against said company after the expiration of said sixty (60) days, the lapse of time shall be taken and deemed conclusive evidence against the validity of said claim, any statute to the contrary notwithstanding."

Plaintiff offered testimony tending to show negligence on the part of the company in handling such car, and the resulting damage occasioned thereby; also that he served notice upon the station agent of the defendant company at McHenry on March 18th, and before the stock had been removed from McHenry, of his claim for damages, and rested. Thereupon counsel for defendant moved for a directed verdict, L.R.A.1916D.

basing the motion upon the ground, among others, that plaintiff failed to commence his action within the period of sixty days as stipulated in the contract, which motion was granted, and it is this ruling which constitutes the chief complaint of appellant on this appeal. If the stipulation requiring suit to be brought within sixty days is valid and binding, then, of course, the ruling of the court in directing the verdict in defendant's favor must be sustained, for, concededly, no action was brought until long after such time had elapsed.

In construing such stipulation, as well as the other provisions of the contract, it is settled beyond question by the highest court in our land that the contract, being one covering an interstate shipment, is removed from the realm of local state regulations and restrictions, and the same is regulated and controlled exclusively by the laws of Congress, and the liability of the defendant must therefore be determined by the laws of Congress as construed by the United States courts. Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 57 L. ed. 314, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Miller, 226 U. S. 513, 57 L. ed. 323, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155. In both of these cases it was squarely held that the provisions of § 20 of act Feb. 4, 1887, as amended by act June 29, 1906, 34 Stat. at L. 584, chap. 3591, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8563, known as the Carmack amendment, manifested a purpose on the part of Congress to take possession of the subject of the liability of a carrier by railroad for interstate shipments, and that the regulations therein should supersede all state regulations upon the same subject. Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Carl, 227 U. S. 639, 57 L. ed. 683, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Cramer, 232 U. S. 490, 58 L. ed. 697, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Harriman, 227 U. S. 657, 57 L. ed. 690, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397.

It goes without saying that these decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are absolutely controlling upon the state courts. As said by this court in the recent case of Bartels Northern Oil Co. v. Jackman, 29 N. D. 236, 150 N. W. 576: "The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on Federal questions are absolutely controlling when the same questions are presented in state courts, and the latter have no alternative but to follow the Federal authorities."

As before stated, the contract in suit, covering, as it does, an interstate shipment, falls clearly within the Carmack amendment aforesaid. This being true, we are next to inquire whether the stipulation in the contract requiring suit to be commenced within sixty days is valid and enforceable. Referring to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and especially to Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, supra, we find it there announced that the liability imposed by the Federal statute upon carriers of interstate shipments is the liability imposed by the common law upon a common carrier, and that such liability may be limited or qualified by special contract with the shipper, provided the limitation or qualification be just and reasonable, and does not exempt the carrier from responsibility for damages due to its negligence. In this connection see also Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Harriman, 227 U. S. 657, 57 L. ed. 690, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397. In the opinion in the latter case Mr. Justice Lurton, in passing upon the validity of a stipulation in a special contract limiting the time in which suit might be brought to the period of ninety days from the loss or happening of any damage, said:

"The court below held that the stipulation in the shipping contract that no suit shall be brought after the lapse of ninety days from the happening of any loss or damage, 'any statute or limitation to the contrary notwithstanding,' was void. It is conceded that there are statutes in Missouri, the state of the making of the contract, and the state in which the loss and damage occurred, and in Texas, the state of the forum, which declare contracts invalid which require the bringing of an action for a carrier's liability in less than the statutory period, and that this action, though started after the lapse of the time fixed by the contract, was brought within the statutory period of both states. The liability sought to be enforced is the 'liability' of an interstate carrier for loss or damage under an interstate contract of shipment declared by the Carmack amendment of the Hepburn act of June 29, 1906. The validity of any stipulation in such a contract which involves the construction of the statute, and the validity of a limitation upon the liability thereby imposed, is a Federal question to be determined under the general common law, and, as such, is withdrawn from the field of state law or legislation. Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, supra; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 57 L. ed. 417, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176. The liability imposed by the statute is the liability imposed by the common law upon a common carrier, and may be limited or qualified by special contract with the shipper, provided the limitation or qualification be just and reasonable, and does not exempt from loss or responsibility due to negligence. Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger and Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, cited L.R.A.1916D.

"The policy of statutes of limitation is to encourage promptness in the bringing of actions, that the parties shall not suffer by loss of evidence from death or disappearance of witnesses, destruction of documents, or failure of memory. But there is nothing in the policy or object of such statutes which forbids the parties to an agreement to provide a shorter period, provided the time is not unreasonably short. That is a question of law for the determination of the court. Such stipulations have been sustained in insurance policies. Riddlebarger v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 7 Wall. 386, 19 L. ed. 257. A stipulation that an express company should not be held liable unless claim was made within ninety days after a loss was held good in Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. ed. 556. Such limitations in bills of lading are very customary and have been upheld in a multitude of cases. We cite a few: Central Vermont R. Co. v. Soper (C. C. A. 1st C.), 8 C. C. A. 341, 21 U. S. App. 24, 59 Fed. 879; Ginn v. Ogdensburg Transit Co. (C. C. A. 7), 29 C. C. A. 521, 57 U. S. App. 403, 85 Fed. 985; Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97; North British & M. Ins. Co. v. Central Vermont R. Co. 9 App. Div. 4, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1113, affirmed in 168 N. Y. 726, 53 N. E. 1128. Before the Texas and Missouri statutes forbidding such special contracts, short limitations in bills of lading were held to be valid and enforceable. McCarty v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 79 Tex. 33, 15 S. W. 164; Thompson v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 22 Mo. App. 321. See cases to same effect cited in 6 Cyc. 508. The provision requiring suit to be brought within ninety days is not unreasonable."

After a thorough research we find no case decided by the United States Supreme Court upholding a similar limitation where the time fixed for bringing suit was less than ninety days, but counsel for respondent cite two decisions from state courts upholding, as reasonable, stipulations fixing the time at forty days. These are Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Trawick, 68 Tex. 314, 2 Am. St. Rep. 494, 4 S. W. 567; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gatewood, 79 Tex. 89, 10 L.R.A. 419, 14 S. W. 913; but it will be noticed that in neither of the contracts involved in these cases does it appear that there was a stipulation similar to that in the contract in the case at bar, requiring notice of loss or injury to be given by the shipper to the carrier before the stock has been removed from the place of destination or mingled with other stock; and in the last case cited the carrier notified the plaintiff twenty-five days after the delivery that his claim would not be paid.

The question of whether such a stipulation is reasonable depends to a considerable extent upon the purpose sought to be subserved by such stipulation, which is to apprise the carrier promptly, to the end that it may protect itself against fraudulent and unjust claims for damages. Were it not for the sixth stipulation above referred to, requiring notice to be given by the shipper before the stock is removed from the point of destination and mingled with other stock, we might feel inclined to uphold the seventh stipulation, requiring suit to be brought within sixty days, as not unreasonable; but we think, in the light of such prior stipulation, it is manifestly unreasonable to limit plaintiff to sixty days in which to commence his action.

Another reason which prompts us in arriving at this conclusion is the fact that, although plaintiff made prompt claim to damages by serving upon the station agent of the defendant company at McHenry a written notice, defendant took no action thereon at all, and by its silence, no doubt, lulled the plaintiff into a sense of security in waiting, and we think he was justified in delaying action in the hope and belief that his claim would be finally adjusted. In view of these facts, defendant does not stand in a favorable light before the court in urging such defense, and we think it should be held to have waived such stipulation.

Another consideration which has some weight with us in arriving at the above conclusion is the fact that plaintiff did not, and in the nature of things could not, within the limited time fixed in such stipulation, know of the extent of the injuries inflicted upon the stock through defendant's negligence. In this connection we approve the language of the supreme court of Texas in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Stanley, 89 Tex. 42, 33 S. W. 109. The shipping contract in that case contained a clause limiting the time for bringing action to "forty days next after the loss or damage shall have occurred." Upon the trial it was disclosed that at a certain place en route the cattle were unloaded for feeding and watering, and were crowded together in muddy pens in such numbers that it was impossible for them to take sufficient food and water, and that, in consequence, some died and others were greatly injured. In its opinion the court said: "The defendant, by counsel, asked the court to charge the jury that, if the notice was not given, the plaintiff could not recover, and also, in effect, that, if the suit was not instituted within forty days from the time the cause of action accrued, it was not bound. Both of these charges were refused, and their refusal brings up the question as to the validity of the two stipulations in the contract which have been quoted. A stipulation of the character of these in question, to be valid, must be reasonable. At the time the cattle were reshipped at Purell the plaintiff, according to his own testimony, knew that his cattle had been crowded in pens and had suffered for the want of food and water, but did not know the extent of his damages. Under the circumstances, he could, at most, have made only a vague complaint, which would have subserved no useful purpose to either party. It was by no means certain that any serious loss would ensue, and, if the contract is to be construed as requiring notice in such a case, we think it must be held unreasonable."

In the case of New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 624, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a condition in a contract with an express company limiting the right of action to ninety days was reasonable, but the property was entirely lost and never delivered. In the recent case of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Harriman, 227 U. S. 657, 57 L. ed. 690, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397, in which the same period of time was held to be a reasonable limitation, the cattle whose loss was made the basis of the claim for damages were killed instantaneously by reason of a negligent derailment of the train. The doctrine of neither case is applicable to the facts of the case at bar. There the damage was immediately determinable, and the full period of ninety days without a waiver on the part of the railroad company was allowed plaintiff in which to bring his action.

In Southern Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. ed. 556, the court, in considering the question of whether the period of ninety days was a reasonable limit in which the shipper might make claim to damages, held such stipulation reasonable, but added: "Possibly such a condition might be regarded as unreasonable, if an insufficient time were allowed for the shipper to learn whether the carrier's contract had been performed."

In the case at bar, as before stated, the full damage to plaintiff was not, and could not have been, known within the time stipulated for the commencement of an action: for but two out of eight horses were killed or died from injuries at St. Cloud, the point where it is alleged that the defendant's chief act of negligence in the handling of the car took place. Plaintiff contends that another horse died in the following November, and still another in December, 1907, and one in the following year, and the last one within three months of the trial of this action. We therefore think that there is much force in appellant's contention that it was impossible for him to know within such period of sixty days anything definite with reference to the extent of his damage, and that, as applied to the facts in this case, such stipulation is unreasonable.

In this connection we call attention to the recent case of Pierson v. Northern P. R. Co. 61 Wash. 450, 112 Pac. 509, which involves contract stipulations the same as in the case at bar, and wherein the Washington court, under facts similar to those here involved, held unreasonable the stipulation requiring written notice to be given to some officer or station agent of the company before the stock was removed from the place of destination or mingled with other stock. The court said: "This clause of the contract would perhaps be effectual in some cases, but in a case like the present, where the nature and extent of the injuries to the animals surviving could not be ascertained with any degree of certainty within the limited time provided in the contract, the stipulation is unreasonable and inapplicable,"—citing numerous authorities.

Upon parity of reasoning it seems to us that the other stipulation requiring suit to be commenced within sixty days should likewise be held, under these facts, to be unreasonable.

In addition to the above authorities, see valuable note to the case of Hafer v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1913E, 866, where many authorities are collected on the subject. See also Texas & P. R. Co. v. Langbehn, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 158 S. W. 244, and Pacific Coast Co. v. Yukon Independent Transp. Co. 83 C. C. A. 625, 155 Fed. 29.

It has been held, and we think properly, that where a shipping contract limits the time within which an action for damages must be brought, such time must be not only reasonable, but there must be prompt action on the part of the carrier in denying its liability to the end that the shipper may be duly apprised of the fact that suit will be necessary. Lasky v. Southern Exp. Co. 92 Miss. 268, 45 So. 869. See also James v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 81 Kan. 23, 105 Pac. 40.

In view of our conclusion, which leads to a reversal of the judgment, it is but fair to the learned trial judge to state that he was evidently influenced in his decision by certain language found in our former opinion, which he construed as a holding to the effect that the contract in question was in all things valid. The use of such language was, perhaps, unfortunate, but nevertheless the fact remains that the question as to the validity of each of the various stipulations in such special contract was not before us for decision on that appeal, and any such expression was therefore mere dictum. All that we were required to decide, and all that was there decided, was that plaintiff could not maintain his action in tort on the common-law liability when the proof showed that he entered into a special contract governing the rights and liabilities of the parties pertaining to such shipment.

Regarding the validity of the stipulation limiting the extent of defendant's liability, we are not called upon to express an opinion. Such question was neither passed upon by the trial court nor argued in the briefs of counsel. It would therefore be improper for us to consider it at this time.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Annotation—Reasonableness of the time fixed in a contract of shipment of goods or live stock for bringing action.

Generally as to validity of contract limiting time for bringing suits, see note to Hartwell v. Northern P. Exp. Co. 3 L.R.A. 344.

As to validity of contract limiting time for bringing action, or for presentation of claims, for damages, where statute or Constitution prohibits carrier from limiting its common-law liability, see note to L.R.A.1916D.

Liquid Carbonic Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 753.

The reasonableness of the time fixed in a contract of shipment of live stock for presentation of claim for damages is discussed in notes to Wabash R. Co. v. Thomas, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1041, and Baldwin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. ante, 335.

Similar in character to the stipulation in contracts of carriage prescribing a certain time within which notice of loss must be given are the provisions frequently met with in bills of lading, which require that any action to recover for loss or damage to the article shipped should be begun within a specified period. The parties may, if they see fit, fix by agreement a shorter time for the bringing of suit on the contract than that provided by the statute of limitations; and if the period therein limited is reasonable, suit must be brought within that time or the shipper's right of action will be barred. Such a provision is prohibited by no rule of law nor by any consideration of public policy, nor is it at all affected by the existence within the jurisdiction of a statutory or constitutional prohibition against carriers limiting or restricting their common-law liability; since it is held that such a stipulation does not in any way defeat the complete vestiture of the right to recover, but merely requires the assertion of that right by action at an earlier period than would be necessary to defeat it through the operation of the ordinary statute of limitations. But the limitation must be reasonable, and if the period of time specified is such that under the facts of the particular case the shipper could not, with reasonable diligence, be enabled to bring suit before it expired, the attempted limitation is void. 4 R. C. L. § 256.

Thus the time allowed in the following interstate shipments was held unreasonable:

It may be observed that state laws with respect to interstate shipments were superseded by the Carmack amendment of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. at L. 593, chap. 3591, § 7, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8592), to the act of February 4, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. 386, chap. 104, § 20), which furnishes the exclusive rule on the subject of the liability of the carrier under contracts for interstate shipments. See notes to Adams Exp. Co. v. Croninger, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 819.

A stipulation in an interstate shipment of live stock limiting the time for bringing suit to sixty days is in COOKE v. NORTHERN P. R. Co. held unreasonable for reasons clearly stated in the opinion.

So, a stipulation in a contract for an interstate shipment of live stock, requiring suit to be instituted and citation served within forty days after a breach of contract, was in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hume Bros. (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 653, 24 S. W. 915, held unreasonable and void as to the provision requiring service of citation in forty days.

The court said: "This contract requires that not only suit shall be commenced, but that citation shall be served, within forty days next after the damage or loss occurs. We believe that inasmuch as the contract requires citation to be served within forty days, it renders it unreasonable, and that it is an improper stipulation to be imposed upon the shipper. It places the carrier in a position to defeat the contract by its bringing about a situation that will or may make it difficult or impossible for the shipper to obtain the service of the citation. It is admitted that it is not probable that the carrier would do that, but it is possible that it may; and the fact that it may be and can be done is what, in our opinion, renders for one reason that provision of the contract unreasonable. But the principal ground upon which we hold it unreasonable is that it makes the shipper responsible for the diligence of the officer who is intrusted by law with the execution and service of the process. Neither the shipper nor the carrier can control him in this matter to the extent that would absolutely require him within a certain or given number of days to execute the service of citation."

On a later appeal of the Hume Case (1894) 87 Tex. 211, 27 S. W. 110, the entire clause of the contract was pronounced nugatory; since the stipulation as to service of citation being unlawful, the two acts of filing suit and service of citation were so blended that they could not be separated. See also to the same effect Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Elliott (1894) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 26 S. W. 636, and Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Stanley (1895) 89 Tex. 42, 33 S. W. 109.

On the other hand, the following periods after the occurring of the loss or damage have been upheld as reasonable in case of shipment of live stock:

—six months, St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Pearce (1907) 82 Ark. 339, 101 S. W. 763 (interstate); St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Butler (1907) 82 Ark. 469, 102 S. W. 378 (intrastate); St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Burgin (1907) 83 Ark. 502, 104 S. W. 161 (interstate); Hafer v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. (1911) 101 Ark. 310, 142 S. W. 176, Ann. Baldwin* (1912) 53 Colo. 416, 128 Pac. 449 (interstate); Enright v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1915) 96 Kan. 546, 152 Pac. 629 (interstate);

—ninety-one days, Ray v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1915) 96 Kan. 8, L.R.A.—, —, 149 Pac. 397 (interstate);

—ninety days, Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Harriman (1913) 227 U. S. 657, 57 L. ed. 690, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397 (interstate); Adams v. Colorado & S. R. Co. (1911) 49 Colo. 475, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 412, 113 Pac. 1010 (intrastate); Watt v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1913) 90 Kan. 466, 135 Pac. 600 (interstate); Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Hancock (1910) 26 Okl. 254, 109 Pac. 220 (interstate);

—forty days, McCarthy v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (1890) 79 Tex. 33, 15 S. W. 164 (interstate); Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Silegman (1893) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 23 S. W. 298 (intrastate); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gatewood (1890) 79 Tex. 89, 10 L.R.A. 419, 14 S. W. 913 (intrastate); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Trawick (1887) 68 Tex. 314, 2 Am. St. Rep. 494, 4 S. W. 567 (intrastate); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clarke (1893) 5 Tex. Civ. App. 547, 24 S. W. 355 (intrastate); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. White (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 32 S. W. 322 (interstate).

So, where a contract for an interstate shipment of live stock provided that an action must be brought within sixty days after any loss or damage should occur, and a shipper, instead of bringing an action, used nearly all the time in trying to effect a settlement, it was stated in Thompson v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1886) 22 Mo. App. 321, that, conceding that the shipper was justified in not bringing his action during the time of his negotiations for a settlement, yet the twelve days remaining after he discovered he could not settle were a reasonable time in which he might and should have begun his suit.

So, in the case of goods, the following period was deemed reasonable:

—one year, Ingram v. Weir (1909) 166 Fed. 328 (interstate); —three months, Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1898) 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97 (interstate); North British & M. Ins. Co. v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 4, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1113, affirmed without opinion in (1899) 158 N. Y. 726, 38 N. E. 1128; Central Vermont R. Co. v. Soper (1894) 8 C. C. A. 341, 21 U. S. App. 24, 59 Fed. 879 (interstate); the court observing that very likely an exception would arise if there was an entire lack of knowledge on the part of the consignee, during the entire period of limitation, of the existence of any loss or damage, when coupled with a lack of circumstances imposing the duty of making inquiry, or for so much of the period as practically bars investigation during what remains of it, even with the utmost diligence; but this case involves only circumstances transpiring in the ordinary course of transactions, and which must, therefore, be assumed to have been anticipated and met by the express stipulation which parties have agreed on); —ninety days, Texas & P. R. Co. v. Langbehn (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 158 S. W. 244 (interstate); —sixty days, Pacific Coast Co. v. Yukon Independent Transp. Co. (1907) 83 C. C. A. 625, 155 Fed. 29 (interstate).

The reasonableness of the time fixed is generally a question of fact to be determined by the jury. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hume Bros. (1894) 87 Tex. 211, 27 S. W. 110; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hawkins (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 1113. J. D. C.

Messrs. Brett & Billups, for defendant in error:

Sharp, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced December 28, 1911, to foreclose a chattel mortgage given as security for the payment of a promissory note executed by defendant to plaintiffs. The petition, among other things, alleged that plaintiffs were a copartnership doing business in Sentinel, Oklahoma, under the firm name and style of Bolen Bros. Defendant answered, setting up as a defense that plaintiffs were transacting business in the state of Oklahoma under a fictitious name and designation not showing the names of the persons interested in said partnership, and had not filed with the clerk of the district court of Washita county, Oklahoma, a certificate stating the names in full of the members of said copartnership and their place of residence, and caused the same to be published in some newspaper for four weeks in said county as required by law, and prior to the bringing of said action, and that there were newspapers published in said county of Washita at and prior to the filing of said action. At the trial, December 12, 1912, the parties entered into a stipulation that the members of the firm were W. C. Bolen and Park Bolen, and that they had never published any statement or filed any certificate in the office of the clerk of the district court as provided in §§ 5023, 5025, Comp. Laws 1909 (§§ 4469, 4471, Rev. Laws 1910). Defendant then moved to dismiss plaintiffs' actions because of such failure to comply with the statute, which motion was by the court sustained, and, from the judgment rendered in favor of defendant, plaintiffs bring error.

The sole question to be determined is whether it was incumbent upon W. C. Bolen and Park Bolen, doing business under the firm name of "Bolen Bros.," to comply with the statute above referred to before they could prosecute this cause of action against defendant; in other words, is "Bolen Bros." a fictitious name or designation within the meaning of § 5023, supra? The question has heretofore been before this court, with such conclusions reached that both parties to the present case are asserting their respective contentions under different decisions.

In Patterson v. Byers, 17 Okla. 633, 89 Pac. 1114, 10 Ann. Cas. 810, W. K. Patterson and N. H. Patterson were partners doing business as the Patterson Furniture Company, and, not having complied with the provisions of the statute, it was objected that they were doing business in violation of the statute, and could not prosecute the action. But the court said: "Now, we think the name Patterson, being the true surname of every member of the partnership known as the Patterson Furniture Company, can in no sense be said to be a fictitious name. And, under the ruling of the California supreme court in construing this statute, the word 'Patterson,' being the true surname of the members composing the Patterson Furniture Company, is a name that discloses the names of the members of the partnership, and that such a designation and doing business under such a title is not doing business under a fictitious name, or under a name which does not disclose the true names of the partners, and that partners doing business under such an appellation are not within the provisions of the sections referred to, and are not required to file and publish the certificate therein required."

Our statute was taken from California, and the decision in the above case was rested upon the cases of Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 24 Pac. 659; McLean v. Crow, 88 Cal. 644, 28 Pac. 596; and Guiterman v. Wishon, 21 Mont. 458, 54 Pac. 586, construing a statute the same as that of California. The question in both of the California cases was somewhat different from the one here, in that the partnership name was made up of the names of the two members thereof. However, the principle announced was that a partnership name showing the surname only of the partners was not a fictitious name or designation within the meaning of the statute, and it was not necessary that the partners file a certificate as provided in the statute. The facts in the Guiterman Case are very like those here presented. It was there held that Guiterman Bros., a copartnership composed of A. Guiterman, S. A. Guiterman, and L. A. Guiterman, was not a fictitious name, nor a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business, within any reasonable meaning of the statute.

The doctrine announced in the Patterson Case has never been overruled by this court, notwithstanding the decision in Baker v. Van Ness, 25 Okla. 34, 105 Pac. 660 (in which no reference was made to the Patterson Case), as appears from the opinion in Bleecker v. Miller, 40 Okla. 374, 138 Pac. 809, where, after citing the Patterson Case and the cases upon which it was predicated, it is said of the decision in the Baker Case that, the plaintiff having failed and neglected to file a reply to the special defense of failure to comply with §§ 5023, 5025, Comp. Laws 1909, the allegation of new matter in the answer being uncontroverted, and the same constituting a complete defense to the action, the court's action in rendering judgment in favor of plaintiff was contrary to law. It thus appears, in the view of the court in the latter case, the question in the Baker Case was one of pleading, and that there was no intention to depart from the earlier opinion of the court in the Patterson Case.

In Carlock v. Cagnacci, 88 Cal. 600, 26 Pac. 597, where the firm name of the plaintiff partnership was Carlock & Robb, it being composed of F. M. Carlock and H. D. Robb, the court held that such partnership name was not a fictitious name nor a designation not showing the names of the partners, within the provisions of the statute, and followed the decision in Pendleton v. Cline, L.R.A.1916D.

supra. In Vaughan v. Kujath, 44 Mont. 484, 120 Pac. 1121, the action was brought to recover on a promissory note signed by defendants and others in favor of "McLaughlin Bros.;" the note having been transferred by the latter to the plaintiff. The only defense interposed by defendants was that "McLaughlin Bros.," the payee in the note, was a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in the business conducted by it, and that such partnership had not complied with the provisions of the statute as to filing and publishing certificate showing the names of the members in full. It was held that the name "McLaughlin Bros." did not come within the statute. In Walker v. Stimmel, 15 N. D. 484, 107 N. W. 1081, the partnership name of the plaintiffs was Walker & Korthof, which the court held not to be a fictitious name, nor a designation failing to show the names of the two persons interested as partners. In Bovee v. De Jong, 22 S. D. 163, 116 N. W. 83, the partnership name considered was Bovee & Norfitt, and it was held that such name, being the surnames of the two men constituting the firm, was sufficient notice to enable all interested persons to easily ascertain the initials or Christian names of the respective partners with whom they may deal, and that such name was not fictitious. In Czatt v. Case, 61 Ohio St. 392, 55 N. E. 1004, the firm name, Case & Taylor, was composed of the surnames of the two members of the firm, and it was held that such name was not a fictitious name or designation not showing the names of the persons who constituted the firm, within the meaning of the statute of that state. In Axe v. Tolbert, 179 Mich. 556, 146 N. W. 418, the firm name of the plaintiffs was William Axe & Son, and it was held that there was nothing fictitious or misleading or uncertain in the name, but, on the other hand, it gave the full name of the head of the firm, and plainly disclosed the identity of the other member. In Cross v. Leonard, 181 Mich. 24, 147 N. W. 540, it was held that the adoption as a firm name by a partnership composed of two brothers of their surname, followed by the words "Bros.," was not an "assumed name" within the provisions of the Michigan statute prohibiting the carrying on of any business under an assumed name, unless a certificate showing the real names of the parties was filed. In Castle Bros. v. Graham, 87 App. Div. 97, 84 N. Y. Supp. 120, affirmed in 180 N. Y. 553, 73 N. E. 1120, the action was brought to recover the balance of the price of work done for defendant by the firm of Castle Bros., which assigned its claim to the plaintiff, a corporation. The firm was composed of two brothers named Castle, and it was held that the name "Castle Bros." was not within the section of the Code providing that no person or persons should carry on business under an assumed name, or under any designation other than the real names of the individuals, unless they filed a certificate setting forth the name under which the business was to be conducted and the true names of the persons conducting it. In Hale v. City Cab, Carriage & Transfer Co. 86 Wash. 459, 119 Pac. 837, the name "Hale-Tindall Company," which name contained the names of all the partners, was held not to be an assumed name, within the statute requiring that a certificate be filed of the names of all the members of a partnership doing business under an assumed name.

From the above cases it must be concluded that a partnership doing business under the firm name and style of Bolen Bros. was not transacting business under a fictitious name or designation, when composed of persons whose names were Bolen, and who were brothers, as would make the doing of business by it without compliance with the statute, in violation of law, or preclude them as partners from recovering in the present action should they establish their claim. An excellent case supporting this conclusion is Re Richards Bros. (D. C.) 206 Fed. 932. There, after making special mention of the Pendleton v. Cline case, it was said:

"The courts of Oklahoma, South Dakota, and North Dakota followed the reasoning of the California court in Pendleton v. Cline; Patterson v. Byers; Bovee v. De Jong; and Walker v. Stimmel,—supra. The Ohio court, after certain conflicting decisions between the inferior courts, finally decided this matter in Cochran v. Hirsch, 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 41, holding that the style 'Hirsch Bros.' was not a fictitious name. In this case the Ohio court again cites with approval the California case of Pendleton v.

Cline, supra. After the courts of all these other states, with statutes similar to California, had followed the case of Pendleton v. Cline, and had assumed that, if a man by the name of Pendleton and a man by the name of Williams could do business under the name of 'Pendleton & Williams' without violating the statute, two brothers could do business in their surname with the word 'Bros.' added, then in 1902 came the decision in the California supreme court in North v. Moore, 135 Cal. 621, 67 Pac. 1037, holding that the name 'Abrams Bros.' was a violation of the California statute, and that it did not show the names of the persons interested as partners. It is a very brief opinion. No argument nor reasons are given for the results reached. Absolutely no reference is made to their own opinion in Pendleton v. Cline and the other decisions of their own court, and in numerous other states which had followed Pendleton v. Cline. A careful reading of the case of North v. Moore, supra, indicates that no one appeared before the court to represent the appellant, and that the decision of the lower court was affirmed on the supposition that the appeal from the order of the lower court had been abandoned. There is nothing in this case to indicate that there was any intention on the part of the California court to change the rule laid down in Pendleton v. Cline, and there is nothing in this decision which should change the uniform holding of the courts that names like 'Richards Bros.' are not assumed or fictitious."

It follows that the trial court erred in sustaining defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' petition, for which the cause is reversed and remanded.

All the Justices concur.

see note to Hendley v. Bittinger, L.R.A. 1915F, 711.

Statutes of the kind in question, with two or three variations in form, have been passed, and construed in the particular considered in this annotation, in at least ten states. In California, Montana, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, and South Dakota (and perhaps other states) the statute provides that every partnership transacting business in the state under a fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business, must file a certificate stating the names, in full, of all members of the partnership, etc. In Michigan, New York, and Washington (and perhaps other states) the statute provides that no person or persons shall carry on or conduct or transact business in the state under any assumed name, or under any designation, name, or style other than the real name or names of the individual or individuals conducting such business, etc., unless such person or persons shall file a certificate setting forth the name under which the business is conducted and the true or full name or names of the persons owning or conducting it, etc. And in Washington, at least, a proviso is added, that the statute shall not be deemed to prevent the lawful use of a partnership name which includes the true and real name or names of all of the parties conducting such business or having an interest therein. In Vermont (and perhaps other states) the statute requires that a person doing business in the state under any name other than his own, and every copartnership doing business in the state under any name which does not contain the surnames of all copartners without any other descriptive or designating words, except the Christian names or initials of such copartners, shall make and file returns setting forth certain facts, etc. For other provisions of the respective statutes, which are not material to the subject of the present annotation, or which have not yet been construed in the particular here considered, see the laws of the respective states.

It is well settled that a firm or partnership name consisting of the surnames of the partners, joined by "&" or "and," is not an assumed or fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners, or a designation, name, or style other than the real names of the persons conducting the business, within the meaning of any of the statutes. Pendleton v. Cline (1890) 85 Cal. 142, 24 Pac. 659; Carlock v. Cagnacci (1891) 88 Cal. 600, 26 Pac. 597; McLean v. Crow (1891) 88 Cal. 644, 26 Pac. 596; Lamberson v. Bashore (1914) 167 Cal. 387, 139 Pac. 817 (distinguishing North v. Moore (Cal.) infra); Walker v. Stimmel (1906) 15 N. D. 484, 107 N. W. 1081; Czatt v. Case (1899) 61 Ohio St. 392, 55 N. E. 1004; Kinsey v. Ohio Southern R. Co. (1895) 3 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 249; Clark v. Doe (1896) 8 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 685; Bovee v. De Jong (1908) 22 S. D. 163, 116 N. W. 83; Bowman v. L.R.A. 1916D.

And the partnership name, "Hale-Tindall Co.," containing the surnames of all the partners, is sufficient as falling within the proviso to the Washington statute. Hale v. City Cab, Carriage & Transfer Co. (1912) 66 Wash. 459, 119 Pac. 837.

Similarly, BOLEN v. LIGETT is supported by the following cases, holding that a partnership or firm name, style, or designation consisting of the common surname of brothers who compose the partnership or firm, followed by the abbreviation "Bros.," is not an assumed or fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested, or a designation, name, or style other than the real name or names of the partners, within the meaning of any of the several statutes: Re Richards Bros. (1913) 206 Fed. 932 (under Michigan statute); Cross v. Leonard (1914) 181 Mich. 24, 147 N. W. 540; Guterman v. Wishon (1898) 21 Mont. 458, 54 Pac. 566; Vaughan v. Kujath (1912) 44 Mont. 484, 120 Pac. 1121; Castle Bros. v. Graham (1903) 87 App. Div. 97, 84 N. Y. Supp. 120, affirmed without opinion in (1905) 180 N. Y. 553, 73 N. E. 1120; Cochran v. Hirsch (1896) 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 41.

But, on the other hand, in North v. Moore (1902) 135 Cal. 621, 67 Pac. 1037, the court, affirming a judgment which had been rendered against certain of the plaintiffs who were copartners under a firm name consisting of their common surname followed by the word "Bros." ("Abrams Bros."), on the ground that they had not filed any certificate as required by statute,—said: "Appellants offered no evidence in support of the alleged partnership, and they make no answer in their brief to this defense. They make no objection to the judgment, except as it affects their claim against defendant Moore. 'Abrams Bros.' cannot be said to be a designation 'showing the names of the persons interested as partners.' The firm name might apply equally to a partnership composed of two or more, and might embrace all or only some of the brothers of the name of Abrams. The statute clearly defeats their right to maintain the action against Moore, and leaves them without any right to be heard on this appeal. We have, however, examined the record, and can discover no error."

And in Doob v. Lovell Mfg. Co. (1896) 4 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 189, it was held that the name, "M. Doob & Bro.," applied to a partnership composed of two brothers, M. & L. Doob, while not a fictitious name, was a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners within the meaning of the Ohio statute, the court saying: "M. Doob & Bro. doubtless means M. Doob & Brother. This designation may be interpreted, M. Doob & Doob. It might also include brother of the half-blood, or, by loose interpretation, a brother-in-law. There might also be several brothers. Hence it is not at all clear what the names of the persons are who compose the firm."

Regarding the case of North v. Moore (Cal.) supra, however, the court, in Re Richards Bros. (Fed.) supra, said: "After the courts of all these other states, with statutes similar to California, had followed the case of Pendleton v. Cline (1890) 85 Cal. 142, 24 Pac. 659, and had assumed that, if a man by the name of Pendleton and a man by the name of Williams could do business under the name of 'Pendleton & Williams' without violating the statute, two brothers could do business in their surname with the word 'Bros.' added, then in 1902 came the decision in the California supreme court in North v. Moore (Cal.) supra, holding that the name 'Abrams Bros.' was a violation of the California statute, and that it did not show the names of the persons interested as partners. It is a very brief opinion. No argument nor reasons are given for the results reached. Absolutely no reference is made to their own opinion in Pendleton v. Cline and the other decisions of their own court, and in numerous other states which had followed Pendleton v. Cline. A careful reading of the case of North v. Moore (Cal.) supra, indicates that no one appeared before the court to represent the appellant, and that the decision of the lower court was affirmed on the supposition that the appeal from the order of the lower court had been abandoned. There is nothing in this case to indicate that there was any intention on the part of the California court to change the rule laid down in Pendleton v. Cline, and there is nothing in this decision which should change the uniform holding of the courts that names like 'Richards Bros.' are not assumed or fictitious."

And in Cochran v. Hirsch (Ohio) supra, the court says, concerning the Doob Case: "The reasoning of the learned judge would have brought me to a different conclusion. He reasons that 'M. Doob & Bro.' means M. Doob & Doob, L.R.A.1916D.

and, if that be true, following the decision made in the California case [Pendleton v. Cline (Cal.) supra], it will be equivalent to saying 'Pendleton & Williams.' But the court, in the Doob Case, also said, further, assuming that under the authority of the California cases cited, "partners doing business as Doob & Doob or M. Doob & Doob would not be required to register under the provisions of the act in question, yet I do not think their reasoning should be extended to a case such as the one under consideration."

And in Lamberson v. Bashore (1914) 167 Cal. 387, 139 Pac. 817, the supreme court of California further said: "The case of North v. Moore (1902) 135 Cal. 622, 67 Pac. 1037, is not in opposition to the other authorities cited above. From the designation 'Abrams Bros.' it would be impossible to determine how many persons were in the firm. But 'Lamberson & Lamberson' indicates that two persons of that name are engaged in business together."

And "there can be no doubt that" the firm name "Wilson Bros. Garage," although used by two brothers whose common surname is "Wilson," is a "name which does not contain the surnames of all copartners . . . without any other descriptive or designating words, except the Christian names or initials of such copartners," within the Vermont statute. Wilson Bros. Garage v. Tudor (1915) — Vt. —, 95 Atl. 794.

"The firm name of William Axe & Son," however, is not "an assumed or fictitious name in contemplation of the [Michigan] statute," as applied to a firm composed of the person named in full, and his son. "There is nothing fictitious or misleading or uncertain in the name. It gives the full name of the head of the firm, and plainly discloses the identity of the other member. Persons doing business with the firm would be advised who the members were and whom to hold responsible." Axe v. Tolbert (1914) 179 Mich. 556, 146 N. W. 418.

Nor is a partnership name consisting of the full name of one of the two partners composing the firm, followed by the words "& Co." either assumed or fictitious within the Michigan statute. Zemon v. Trim (1914) 181 Mich. 130, 147 N. W. 540.

But in Byers v. Bourret (1883) 64 Cal. 73, 28 Pac. 61, a name of this kind ("J. D. Byers & Co.," used by J. D. Byers and another, as copartners) was apparently assumed to be within the California statute,—a judgment for the plaintiffs in a suit to recover on a note payable to "J. D. Byers & Co." having been reversed and the cause remanded with instructions to render judgment for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiffs had not filed and published the required certificate.

A name consisting of the common surname of two partners composing a firm, followed by the words "Furnace Co.," however, is neither a fictitious name nor a designation not showing the names of the partners interested as partners, within the Oklahoma statute. Patterson v. Byers (1907) 17 Okla. 633, 89 Pac. 1114, 10 Ann. Cas. 810.

And a name used by an individual, which consists of his full name followed by the words "Automobile Co.," is within the proviso to the Washington statute, so that he is not required to file the certificate. Merrill v. Caro Invest. Co. (1912) 70 Wash. 482, 127 Pac. 122.

And a statute requiring every partnership transacting business under a fictitious name or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested in the business, to file a certificate stating the facts, etc., does not apply to a single individual doing business under his surname followed by the words "Furniture and Carpet Co." (Lander v. Sheehan (1905) 32 Mont. 25, 79 Pac. 406); or under her surname followed by the word "Sisters" (Oklahoma F. Ins. Co. v. Wagester (1913) 38 Okla. 291, 132 Pac. 1071).

But "it is plain that" two partners doing business under the name and style of the "Elite Theatre" "were conducting business as partners under a fictitious name within the meaning of" the Oklahoma statute, "and were therefore required to publish the certificate prescribed" thereby. Farquharson v. Wadkins (1915) — Okla. —, 153 Pac. 1160. A. C. W.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

CENTRAL GEORGIA POWER COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,
v.

W. C. POPE.

(141 Ga. 186, 80 S. E. 642.)

Venue — nuisance — loss of rent.

1. As to the question of venue, this case is controlled by the decision in Central Georgia Power Co. v. Stubbs, 141 Ga. 172. For other cases, see Venue, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Damages — nuisance — permanent injury.

2. In cases of nuisances which cause permanent injury to land, the ordinary rule is that the measure of damages is the depreciation in the market value; in regard to nuisances which are of a nonpermanent, abatable, or temporary nature, the depreciation in the usable or rental value ordinarily furnishes the measure. But, under some circumstances, there may also be a recovery for special damages.

For other cases, see Damages, III. k, 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

Note. — A careful search has failed to disclose any other case than CENTRAL GEORGIA POWER Co. v. POPE passing upon the question of the right to damages for injury to business from a nuisance resulting in the depopulation of a community or neighborhood. It would seem, as stated by the court, that damages of this kind are too remote to be recoverable.

In connection with this question, however, see note to Liermann v. Milwaukee, 1907, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 253, as to loss of customers as an element of damages from the obstruction of highway, and see also the case L.R.A.1916D.

Same — double.

3. An owner of land alleged to have been injured cannot have a recovery of such a character as to include double damages for the same injury.

(a) Under the demurrer in the present case, it is unnecessary to lay down any exact rule as to when a nuisance may be treated as permanent, and when as nonpermanent.

For other cases, see Damages, III. k, 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — interference with access.

4. If an actionable nuisance interferes with ingress to and egress from a store, or so injuriously affects the property as to render it wholly or partly unsuitable for use or rent, or deters customers from resorting thereto, and proximately causes a loss of custom in an established business, this will furnish a basis for recovery of damages.

For other cases, see Nuisance, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — loss of custom.

5. If a company, for the purpose of operating an electric plant, erected a dam in of Henderson v. Lexington, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 20. The notes in 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 227, and 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 75, deal with the obstruction of the highway preventing access to property except by a circuitous route, as special injury entitling the owner to maintain an action for damages or to abate the nuisance. And as to whether the fact that one is prevented by an unlawful obstruction from using a highway causes him a special damage which will sustain an action by him against the wrongdoer, see notes in 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1053, and L.R.A.1915D, 142.

such manner as to create a nuisance by backing water from which mosquitoes were bred and miasma caused, so that many people in the vicinity were made sick, and some died, and others moved away, and thereby the custom of the plaintiff at his store was decreased, loss of custom thus resulting would not furnish a basis for recovery by him, at least unless the injury to others was alleged and shown to have been wilful, and for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff.

For other cases, see Nuisances, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — interference with dwelling.

6. The owner of a dwelling house which he occupies as a home may recover just compensation for the annoyance and discomfort occasioned by the maintenance by another of a nuisance on adjacent premises.

(a) The subject of treating depreciation in rental value, not as an independent basis of recovery, but as bearing on the amount to be recovered for annoyance and discomfort in the use of a dwelling house, is not now involved.

(b) The different means of measuring damages are not to be so applied as to give double damages for the same thing.

For other cases, see Nuisances, II. a; Damages, III. k, 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Pleading — demurrer.

7. The other grounds of the demurrer to the petition as amended were without merit. For other cases, see Pleading, VII. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(December 19, 1913.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Newton County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's business alleged to have been caused by the creation of a nuisance by defendant. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hatcher & Smith and Greene F. Johnson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Rogers & Knox, for defendant in error:

The courts of Newton county have jurisdiction over the defendant in suits for torts committed in the county.

Atlanta, B. & A. R. Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 138 Ga. 356, 75 S. E. 468; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Bennefield, 138 Ga. 670, 75 S. E. 981; Davis v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 17 Ga. 339.

If one's unlawful act is the efficient cause of an injury, his personal presence at the time of its beginning, its continuance, or its results is not essential, but he is responsible for the consequences thereof, even if he stands afar off, out of sight, or in another jurisdiction.

Brown, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 92. L.R.A.1916D.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The headnotes require no elaboration except in one or two particulars.

In applying different possible measures of damages, they should not be so used as to duplicate damages for the same injury. Thus, to illustrate, to allow a recovery on account of the loss of the rental value of a tract of land or part of a tract, the loss of its value for use, and the loss of crops upon the same tract or part for the same year, would be to permit the plaintiff to recover more than once for substantially the same item of damages. The rules for measuring damages should not be so applied as to work this result.

Again, the court, over objection, allowed an amendment to the petition, in one part of which damages to the extent of $5,000 were claimed because of injury to the plaintiff's mercantile business. The amendment alleged that the plaintiff had a storehouse upon his property, where he conducted a profitable mercantile business; that prior to the erection of the dam he sold $18,000 or $20,000 worth of goods annually; that for the then current year he might probably be able to sell $5,000 worth of goods; that he had established a trade and good will in his business, of the value of $5,000 per year; and that he had been damaged in that sum. He then proceeded to allege the cause of this damage as follows: "On account of the nuisance created by defendant's dam, and the malaria and the mosquitoes therefrom arising and being in that community, the customers of plaintiff have been made sick, and some died, and many others moved away, so much so that a once happy and prosperous section of Newton county has become almost a waste and howling wilderness, and the common schools and Sunday schools and churches broken up, and, out of 124 plows before the dam was built, there are now left 14 plows in one community. The greater portion of plaintiff's trade was derived from customers who lived in that neighborhood, and plaintiff had built up a special trade in his line among the people living near his store, with an annual profit of $5,000. Plaintiff alleges that, on account of the building of the dam by defendant and sickness and mosquitoes therefrom in that community, nearly all of his customers have moved away, and that part of his trade has been diverted into other channels, and has been lost to him; and, further, these customers have formed trade relations elsewhere with other parties, and will never return to the plaintiff. He further says that he lost in bad debts in 1911 $2,000 for goods sold at said store, which he could not collect on account of sickness caused by the defendant, and that he lost the profit on $5,000 worth of goods, which he would have sold but for this sickness, and also profit on $15,000 worth of goods in 1912; and for the damage of his business, the good will thereof, he sues for $5,000, and asks judgment therefor."

Generally, a tort committed upon one person furnishes no cause of action in favor of another. In the complexity of human life, it is rarely the case that a homicide of one person, or a serious personal injury inflicted upon him, does not indirectly affect others. To maim a member of a firm, and thus disqualify him from the performance of his duties, may result in serious consequential loss to his partners. To kill or wound a debtor may lessen the chances of his creditors to obtain payment. To hurt an agent may incidentally affect his principal. But ordinarily these incidental damages arising from an injury committed, not upon the party so damaged, but upon a third person, furnish no right of action to the party thus indirectly affected. Numerous other illustrations might be given. We are not here concerned with the relations of husband and wife, parent and child, or master and servant, and the rights of action which may arise from them by statute or common law. Even where there was a contract relation between the person upon whom the tort was directly committed and the person who claimed to be damaged, it has been declared that, if the injury consists only in impairing the ability or inclination of the former to perform his part, or increasing the plaintiff's expense or labor of fulfilling such contract, this furnishes no right of recovery to the plaintiff unless the wrongful act was wilful, and for that purpose. 1 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. 99, § 33; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 25 Conn. 265, 65 Am. Dec. 571; Brink v. Wabash R. Co. 160 Mo. 87, 53 L.R.A. 811, 83 Am. St. Rep. 459, 60 S. W. 1058.

In McNary v. Chamberlain, 34 Conn. 384, 91 Am. Dec. 732, a declaration alleged that the plaintiff had contracted with the town of H. to keep a highway in repair for three years, and that the defendant, intending to injure the plaintiff, deposited a quantity of stone and rubbish on the road, and obstructed a drain so that the water ran over and injured the road, by means of which the plaintiff was subjected to greater expense in keeping the road in repair. On demurrer, it was held that, if the acts mentioned were done with an actual intent to injure the plaintiff, the defendant was liable. The amendment in the present case does not measure up to the allegations there considered. It is alleged that, on L.R.A.1916D.

account of the malaria and mosquitoes arising from the pond caused by the defendant's dam, customers of the plaintiff were made sick, and some of them died, and others moved away from the vicinity. It is not pretended that the defendant killed some of the plaintiff's customers, and made others sick, for the purpose of destroying his business. The damages sought to be recovered on this account are too remote. If the plaintiff could recover on this basis, is it not readily perceived why a merchant might not bring an action against a railroad company for loss of custom arising from the death of a good customer caused by its negligence, or why, if one person should create a nuisance in a neighborhood which should cause one of the residents to move to another place, every merchant with whom such person dealt before his removal could not recover because his patronage had been lost after his change of residence? It will be readily seen that such claims for damages might be extended into almost limitless ramifications. They do not fall within the rules in cases where property has been physically injured, or there has been some interference with an easement or right connected with or appurtenant thereto.

Thus, in some cases there was an interference with the means of ingress and egress. Harvey v. Georgia Southern & F. R. Co. 90 Ga. 66, 15 S. E. 783; Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Hardey, 112 Ga. 604, 52 L.R.A. 396, 37 S. E. 888. In another a city erected in a street a bridge which resulted in permanent injury to the business conducted by a lessee of abutting property. Pause v. Atlanta, 98 Ga. 92, 58 Am. St. Rep. 290, 26 S. E. 489. In other cases there was a physical interruption of business. Sturgis v. Frost, 56 Ga. 188; Juchter v. Boehm, 67 Ga. 534. It may also be true that if, by means of a nuisance, one renders the place of business of another so unhealthy or unpleasant as to drive away customers or prevent their coming to it, the person creating the nuisance may be liable. Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296; 4 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. 1050. And although a nuisance may also cause damage to others, this does not destroy the plaintiff's right of action for injury peculiar to his property. 4 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. § 1058. The facts in such cases are easily distinguishable from those alleged here. Injury to property or property rights causing loss of custom in an established business is not the same as injury to customers claimed to result in damage to the property owner.

In the original petition there was a statement that the defendant, "contriving and intending to injure, prejudice, and aggrieve the plaintiff, and to incommode and annoy him in the possession, occupation, and enjoyment of his said lands, wrongfully, injuriously, and negligently, and improperly erected its dam, and constructed its plant," without acquiring, by purchase or condemnation, sufficient lands on the banks of certain rivers to enable it to back water in them without injuring him. But this had no relation to killing his customers, or making them sick, or causing them to move from the community, with a specific intent to injure him, and such general allegations in the original petition are not sufficient to free the portion of the amendment under discussion from being subject to objection. It should have been stricken or rejected on the ground herein indicated.

Judgment affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

W. C. HALL

v.

KANSAS CITY TERRA COTTA COMPANY.

SOUTHWEST NATIONAL BANK OF KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI, Interpleader, Appt.

(97 Kan. 103, 154 Pac. 210.)

Garnishment — assigned proceeds of contract.

1. Where a defendant corporation assigned to a bank the proceeds of a contract due and to become due for furnishing materials and labor to a building contractor, such assignment is valid as against a garnishment of the funds in the hands of the building contractor.

For other cases, see Garnishment, II. e, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Assignment — proceeds of building contract.

2. Such an assignment is not a chattel mortgage requiring registration to be valid against the claim of another creditor proceeding by writ of garnishment.

For other cases, see Garnishment, II. e, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(January 8, 1916.)

APPEAL by interpleader from an order of the District Court for Montgomery County denying its motion for a new trial of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note, and to garnish an amount owing to defendant to be applied upon plaintiff's claim, in which judgment was entered for plaintiff against the claim of the interpleader. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

pellant bank of the Neville contract, to secure a valid debt and to secure a loan then made, gave the bank paramount right to the amount in controversy. The assignment was valid as against a subsequent attaching creditor, though no notice was given.

The transfer and actual delivery of the Neville contract by defendant to the bank amounted in law to a pledge of that contract and of the beneficial interest therein and all moneys which might be derived therefrom. This, under the doctrine of pledges, gave the bank a superior right to the amount in controversy.

Dawson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, W. C. Hall, commenced this action on October 12, 1912, against the Kansas City Terra Cotta Company to recover on the defendant's promissory note, and on the same day caused garnishment proceedings to be served on Albert Neville, a Coffeyville contractor. Neville, the garnishee, answered and alleged that on July 26, 1912, he had entered into a written contract with the defendant, the Kansas City Terra Cotta Company, for certain materials to be delivered to him at Coffeyville on or before September 20, 1912. Other allegations covered failure of the terra cotta company to comply in full with its contract, consequent damages to garnishee, including freight bills which he was compelled to pay for the defendant, etc. He also pleaded that on November 16, 1912, he had been notified by the Southwest National Bank of Kansas L.R.A.1916D.

City, Missouri, that the claim of the terra cotta company had been assigned to it on September 16, 1912, and advising him that all the proceeds of his contract should be paid to the bank. He also prayed that the bank should be impleaded and required to set up its rights, and that he be protected.

By leave of court, the bank filed its answer and cross petition, and by agreement of parties, and with the approval of the court, Neville, the garnishee, was permitted to pay into court a sum of money and was discharged. This action thereupon proceeded between the plaintiff and the interpleading bank.

Incorporated in the terms of the terra cotta company's note of September 16, 1912, to the bank, was the following: "Having deposited with said bank as collateral security (being the legal holder) for the payment thereof, and also for all other present or future demands or claims of any kind of the said bank against the undersigned, due or not due (give brief description or summary of collateral here), sundry contracts which the makers and indorsers hereof hereby authorize said bank, or its president or cashier, to sell without notice at public or private sale at option of said bank or its assigns (and with the right to said bank or its assigns to be the purchaser of all or any part of said collateral, at any such sale), in case of nonperformance of the promise, applying the net proceeds to the payment of the note, including interest, and accounting for the surplus, if any, and in case of deficiency, promise to pay said bank, or its order, the amount thereof forthwith after such sale, with interest as provided above; and in case of any exchange of, or additions to, the collaterals above named, the provision of this note shall extend to such new or additional collaterals. The margin of collaterals to be kept satisfactory to said bank, or in default thereof, the note to become due and payable."

The instrument purporting to assign the Neville contract to the bank professed on its face to be an "assignment of collateral, contracts for work and material." In substance it recited that the terra cotta company was a customer of the bank, indebted to it, and contemplated further indebtedness, and to secure the payment thereof the debtor set over to the bank certain items including the Neville contract, and continues thus:

"The purpose of this assignment is to transfer to assignee the net contract price, that is to say, the sums due and to accrue upon this contract to assignor over and above necessary expenditures of like nature at the point of construction,—no allowances for outlays or expenditures at point of manufacture to be made except upon written consent of assignee.

"To avoid embarrassment to business of assignor and to relations of assignor with contracting parties, assignor is hereby made agent of assignee, to receive and receipt for sums due and payable and to become due and payable upon the above assigned items; however, same to be for account and use of assignee, and all sums so collected by said assignor to be forthwith turned over to assignee for credit in pursuance of the purpose above stated. Provided, however, that this agency is to be subject to revocation by assignee, and right of accounting at any and all times is expressly reserved."

The district court found that the terra cotta company was indebted to the bank, and that, for the purpose of securing the same and to procure a further loan which was then made, the contract between Neville and the terra cotta company was assigned and delivered to the bank on September 16, 1912; that the bank did not notify Neville until about a month after this action and garnishment were begun. The court's judgment, in part, proceeds thus: "The court further finds that said assignment, taken and considered in connection with a number of similar transactions between the said terra cotta company and the bank, and their method of doing business and course of dealing, as shown by the evidence, is and was a conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage of personal property, and that it was not accompanied by a delivery to the bank of the property, nor was it followed by any actual or continued change of possession of the property covered by the conveyance. The court further finds that neither said assignment from said terra cotta company to said bank, nor any copy thereof, was ever filed or made of record in the office of the register of deeds of Montgomery county, Kansas, or elsewhere, and that the said assignment is void as against the plaintiff, W. C. Hall."

From this judgment and its incidents the bank appeals.

The general rule is that garnishment, like other proceedings in invitum, only affects the actual property, money, credits, and effects of the debtor in the hands of the garnishee, and the rule relating to bona fide holders or purchasers without notice has no application. Kansas Invest. Co. v. Jones, 2 Kan. App. 638, 42 Pac. 935; Bradley v. Byerley, 3 Kan. App. 357, 42 Pac. 930; Johnson v. Brant, 38 Kan. 754, 17 Pac. 794; Rock Island Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Equitable Trust & Invest. Co. 54 Kan. 124, 37 Pac. 983; Citizens Nat. Bank v. Bank of Commerce, 80 Kan. 205, 207, 101 Pac. 1005; Mason v. Saunders, 89 Kan. 300, 131 L.R.A.1916D.

Pac. 562. In 20 Cyc. 1012, it is said: "Where the principal defendant has made a valid assignment of the garnishee's indebtedness, or conveyance of the property in his possession belonging to such defendant, before the service of the summons upon the garnishee, the latter cannot be charged on account of such debt or property. The above rule is especially applicable to bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other evidences of indebtedness, and where such paper is assigned or transferred in good faith before the drawer, maker, or indorser thereof is served in garnishment proceedings by a creditor of the payee, or of the last holder thereof, the rights of the assignee or transferee are not affected by such proceedings." Page 1013.

"In the absence of statutory provision prescribing the mode of assignment, no particular mode or form is necessary to effect a valid assignment of property, claims, or debts so as to defeat garnishment proceedings by a creditor of the assignor. If the intent of the parties to effect an assignment be clearly established, that is sufficient, and the assignment may be in the form of an agreement or order or any other instrument which the parties may see fit to use for that purpose. . . . The rule is sometimes broadly stated that an assignment is not complete so as to defeat proceedings in garnishment until the garnishee is notified thereof; however, this rule seems to be subject to limitations; thus, as between assignor and assignee, it is not necessary to the validity of an assignment that the garnishee be notified thereof; and the assignment will likewise be complete as against creditors of the assignor instituting garnishment proceedings after assignment and before notice of the assignment to the garnishee, provided that notice of the assignment be given to the garnishee in time to permit him to disclose the assignment in his answer to the garnishee process." Pages 1014, 1016, 1017.

The district court treated the assignment of the contract between the terra cotta company and Neville as a chattel mortgage. If it were treated as a mortgage of the contract, then the possession of the contract by the bank would obviate all necessity for its registration. Nothing is more common than the advancement of funds to contractors and manufacturers, and while banks with proper prudence usually take more tangible security than the potential and possible future profits of the pending contracts of the borrowers, yet there is no impropriety in taking an assignment of the latter also; nor does the statute require such assignments to be recorded.

When the borrower thus assigns his contract or the possible profits of his contract in good faith, such assignments should be respected. Nor can a later garnishing creditor justly complain. The garnishment process only reaches the property, assets, and credits of the debtor, and not that of which the debtor was formerly the owner, nor that which he has lawfully assigned to a third party.

This view seems to be amply sustained by the authorities. In Clark v. Wiss, 34 Kan. 553, 555, 9 Pac. 281, 283, it was held that "a debt due for goods sold and delivered, and resting for evidence on a book account, may be assigned, and such assignment is valid if made by mere delivery."

In the case at bar, the debt due from Neville to the terra cotta company for goods sold and delivered, and resting for evidence on a written contract, was assigned to the bank, and such assignment must likewise be valid though made only by mere delivery of the contract.

In Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Bank of Commerce, 80 Kan. 205, 207, 101 Pac. 1006, 1006, it was said: "We understand that when personal property is pledged the pledgee acquires a right thereto which is superior to any right that can thereafter be given by the pledgeor or be acquired by a subsequent attachment issued in an action against him. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 867, 868, and notes; First Nat. Bank v. Harkness, 42 W. Va. 156, 32 L.R.A. 408, 24 S. E. 548. The assignment and delivery of the certificate constitute a delivery of the property represented thereby. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 856. In the second edition of Jones on Pledges and Collateral Security, § 37, it is said: 'A delivery of a document of title, which serves to put the pledgee in possession of the goods, is equivalent to an actual delivery of them.' This question was discussed and authorities were collected in the case of First Nat. Bank v. Harkness, supra. See also Continental Nat. Bank v. Eliot Nat. Bank (C. C.) 7 Fed. 369. The great weight of authority seems to be that this kind of delivery is sufficient to constitute a pledge. A completed pledge has the effect of depriving the pledgeor of all control over the property, as far as the interest of the pledgee is concerned. He can neither sell nor encumber it so as to dispose of or impair the rights of the pledgee therein. It seems clear that what he cannot do personally cannot be done by a writ of attachment. Generally, the rule has been that an attachment takes only the interest which the owner has when the writ is levied."

The latter case is also pertinent on the question of the necessity for registration or other notice. It was said: "The fact that the attachment creditor acted in good faith and without notice of the pledge is not L.R.A.1916D.

important, as there is no law requiring pledges to be recorded."

It is urged that the assignment of this contract was only part of a larger transaction in which the terra cotta company mortgaged its entire plant and assets to the bank, and since such mortgage was unrecorded, it and all its incidents, including this assignment, are void against the plaintiff, armed with a writ of garnishment. This view did not meet the approval of this court in Clark v. Wiss, supra, where the assignee of the book accounts prevailed against the garnishing creditor, notwithstanding the defects in the mortgage under which the assignee also claimed. Again, it is urged that under the assignment, the bank was only to receive whatever net profit might result from the Neville contract, and there was none such at the time of the assignment, consequently nothing was conveyed to the bank. To this there appears to be two answers: (1) Neville has paid a sum of money into court, which seems to settle the question as to whether he owed the terra cotta company. (2) The instruments from the terra cotta company which we have set out above do not justify the interpretation that only the net profits of the Neville contract were assigned to the bank. The pertinent clause is: "The purpose of this assignment is to transfer to assignee the net contract price; that is to say, the sums due and to accrue upon this contract to assignor over and above necessary expenditures of like nature at the point of construction,—no allowances for outlays or expenditures at point of manufacture to be made except upon written consent of assignee."

The "point of construction" was Coffeyville, and the "point of manufacture" was Kansas City. The net proceeds thus included the cost of manufacture, so that the assignment fairly read covered much more than mere possible net profits. It virtually covered the value of the goods furnished, less possible charges at Coffeyville.

This brings us to the concluding question, and, indeed, to the only question which presents any serious difficulty in this case. We have said that if this conveyance were treated as a chattel mortgage, the physical possession of the contract by the bank would obviate the necessity of its registration. The law is equally well settled that if it were treated as a pledge, neither registration nor notice would be necessary to enforce it. But the appellee, with much force and show of authorities, insists that the appellant cannot rely on these settled principles because the bank did not have exclusive control over the contract and its pertinent incidents; that the bank left the terra cotta company in control; that the bank disavowed any responsibility to carry out the contract assigned to it; that the terra cotta company afterwards changed and reduced the contract price with Neville without the knowledge and consent of the bank; that it adopted the assignor as its agent to receive and receipt for sums due and to become due under the contract, requiring it to account to the assignee for the moneys thus collected.

Does this situation create any distinction recognized by the precedents? As a chattel mortgage it undoubtedly would do so, for however binding such a mortgage would be between the parties, it would not affect third parties where the mortgage was not recorded and the mortgagee was not in exclusive possession. Swiggett v. Dodson, 38 Kan. 702, 17 Pac. 594; Smith-Frazer Boot & Shoe Co. v. Ware, 47 Kan. 483, 28 Pac. 159; Geiser Mfg. Co. v. Murray, 84 Kan. 450, L.R.A.—, —, 114 Pac. 1046. The same necessity as to possession applies to pledges; the pledgee must secure and maintain exclusive control of the thing pledged. Raper v. Harrison, 37 Kan. 243, 245, 15 Pac. 219; Gray v. Doty, 77 Kan. 446, 448, 94 Pac. 1008; Atkinson v. Bush, 91 Kan. 860, 139 Pac. 393; 5 R. C. L. 387.

But in our opinion the assignment was neither a chattel mortgage nor a pledge. It was simply what it purported to be,—an assignment of a sum or sums of money due and to become due. There was nothing about the transaction which was unusual or against public policy. This general subject is one which might well be regulated by statute, but so far it has been left free to develop in the usual course of modern business. Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612 (Syl. ¶¶ 4, 5); Columbia Finance & T. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 116 Ky. 364, 76 S. W. 156; Thayer v. Daniels, 113 Mass. 129; Whittredge v. Sweetser, 189 Mass. 45, 74 N. E. 222; Muir v. Schenck, 3 Hill, 228, 38 Am. Dec. 633; Niles v. Mathusa, 162 N. Y. 546, 57 N. E. 184; Central Trust Co. v. West India Improv. Co. 169 N. Y. 314, 62 N. E. 387; United States v. Vaughan, 3 Binn. 394, 5 Am. Dec. 375; Downer v. South Royalton Bank, 39 Vt. 25; Tingle v. Fisher, 20 W. Va. 497; First Nat. Bank v. Harkness, 42 W. Va. 156, 32 L.R.A. 408, 24 S. E. 548; 4 Cyc. 17, 20.

We do not think the fact that the terra cotta company was made the agent of the bank to collect the proceeds of the contract can affect the validity of the assignment. Neither can the later modification of the contract by remitting $330 of the contract price. That deduction in plain terms recognized that "this money is subject to the order of the court." Recurring to the proposition first laid down, that the garnisheeing creditor can reach only the property of the defendant in the hands of its debtor, the plaintiff could not reach or attach that which had already passed by lawful assignment, and this necessitates a reversal of the judgment with instructions to render judgment for the interpleader.

Annotation—Garnishment of money due or to become due on a contract the proceeds of which have been assigned by the debtor prior to the garnishment.

Generally, as to priority rights of different assignees of funds in the hands of third person, see note to Phillips's Estate, 66 L.R.A. 760; and as to garnishment of unliquidated claims, see note to Waples-Platter Grocer Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 59 L.R.A. 353.

It is intended in the present annotation to cover not only the question of the right to garnishee the proceeds of general contracts, but also of contracts of employment where the question is as to the right to garnishee salary, wages, or earnings. And included among the latter class of cases are some where, strictly speaking, no contract of employment existed. However, the annotation does not cover public officer cases, but for such cases see the note to Roesch v. W. B. Worthen Co. 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 374, which treats the general question of the effect of assignments of unearned salary L.R.A.1916D.

or fees of public officers to put the same, when earned, beyond the reach of creditors.

General contract cases and employment contract cases are separately treated herein, because of the fact that some elements often enter into the decision of a case of the latter class which would be foreign to an adjudication falling within the first group, but as the general controlling principles are in the main similar, both groups should be consulted in practically all instances.

Proceeds of general contracts.

The general rule is that a creditor of a contractor cannot garnishee any proceeds of the contractor in the hands of the contractee which the contractor has previously assigned in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and with notice to or the assent of the garnishee, to a third person.<sup>1</sup> This rule is an application of the general rule of law that the plaintiff cannot reach and subject to the payment of his debt by process of garnishment any funds, property, or demands that the defendant debtor himself could not recover in an action ex contractu against the garnishee.<sup>2</sup>

The general rule, however, is subject to an exception, which is that the plaintiff can so reach such assets in the hands of the garnishee where the assignment to the third person was fraudulent and therefore void in toto, although on account of such assignment the debtor himself could not recover them of the garnishee.<sup>3</sup>

And while some courts might hold that notice of the garnishment would have to be brought home to the contractee before service of the summons of garnishment, in order to entitle the assignee to priority, the better rule undoubtedly is that the assignee is entitled to priority over the garnisheeing creditor, if the garnishee has notice of the assignment in time to permit him to plead such assignment in his answer.<sup>4</sup>

And in the absence of a controlling statute, the general rule above outlined holds even though the amount assigned is in excess of what is sufficient to fully satisfy the obligation of the assignor to the assignee,<sup>5</sup> the plaintiff's remedy in such case being to garnishee the assignee and thereby reach the excess sum that will come into his hands as a result of the assignment before such excess is paid over to the defendant,<sup>6</sup> for to sustain a garnishment against the contractee would be to permit the plaintiff to obtain a judgment against him for a part of the sum assigned, which would result in the splitting up of a single cause of action

<sup>1</sup> The following cases support this rule: American Trust & Sav. Bank v. O'Barr (1915) — Ala. App. —, 67 So. 794 (contractor assigned all sums due and to become due on a contract to construct part of a railroad, as security for money advanced and for such future advances as might be made); Hawley v. Bristol (1872) 39 Conn. 26 (contractor assigned sums due and to become due on a contract to build a house); Porter v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co. (1912) 21 Idaho, 318, 121 Pac. 548 (contractor for the construction of canals and ditches assigned all payments to be made on the contract and all freight rebates recoverable thereunder, in consideration of advancements by assignee); Gray v. Bever (1905) 122 Ill. App. 1 (contractor assigned a part of the money to become due on a contract for digging a well); HALL v. KANSAS CITY TERRA COTTA Co., ante, 361 (contractor assigned proceeds of a contract due and to become due for labor and materials furnished, as collateral security for advancements which were made or should be made); Lutter v. Grosse (1904) 26 Ky. L. Rep. 585, 82 S. W. 278 (contractor for construction of schoolhouse equitably assigned portions of contract price to subcontractor); Millett v. Swift (1910) 138 Ky. 408, 128 S. W. 312 (subcontractor for construction of part of a railroad assigned moneys to become due under his contract, for advances made, etc.); Chester v. McDonald (1904) 185 Mass. 54, 69 N. E. 1075 (contract for the making of a granite monument); William Gilligan Co. v. Casey (1910) 205 Mass. 26, 91 N. E. 124 (one contracting to furnish a city with sand, gravel, and crushed stone assigned the money to be received thereunder); Mack Mfg. Co. v. Smoot (1904) 102 Va. 724, 47 S. E. 859 (contractor for public improvement assigned proceeds due and to become due under contract); Balliet v. Scott (1873) 32 Wis. 174 (contractor for construction of portion of railroad assigned such part of contract price as would be necessary to pay laborers hired by him). And see H. A. Grimwood Co. v. Capital Hill Bldg. & Constr. Co. (1906) 28 R. I. 32, 65 Atl. 304; and South Texas Lumber Co. v. Concrete Constr. Co. (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 139 S. W. 913.

<sup>2</sup> American Trust & Sav. Bank v. O'Barr (Ala.) supra; Walton v. Horkan (1900) 112 Ga. 814, 81 Am. St. Rep. 77, 38 S. E. 105, wherein it was said that the plaintiff in garnishment stands in no better position than the defendant, there being no fraud; HALL v. KANSAS CITY TERRA COTTA Co., wherein the court said that a garnisheeing creditor can reach only the property of the defendant in the hands of the debtor, and that property lawfully assigned is within the rules; Millett v. Swift (Ky.) supra, wherein it was said that the plaintiff acquired only such rights against the garnishee as the assignor had; Balliet v. Scott (Wis.) supra.

<sup>4</sup> HALL v. KANSAS CITY TERRA COTTA Co. And see Walton v. Horkan (Ga.) supra, holding that an assignment of a fund to become due under a contract for lumber, as security for advancements made to enable defendant "to get out the lumber," was entitled to priority over a subsequent garnisheeing creditor, even though the garnishee had not been notified of the assignment before the service of the summons of garnishment.

For a treatment of the general question of priority of garnishment over prior assignment as affected by notice or lack of notice, see annotation to Market Nat. Bank v. Raspberry, L.R.A. —, —.

against the garnishee, who before the garnishment had, by accepting and assenting to the assignment, bound himself to pay the whole fund to the assignee, and to hold that the plaintiff may recover a part and the assignee a part would be to hold that one cause of action may be split into several.<sup>7</sup> But an assignment, as security for advances, of the proceeds of an executory contract, which exceed in amount the assignee's claim, is void as against creditors of the assignor to the extent of the excess, under a statute providing that all assignments of goods, chattels, or things in action made in trust for the use of the person making the same are void against creditors existing and subsequent of such person, but the invalidity exists only to such excess, as that is the extent to which a trust is created for the use or benefit of the assignor.<sup>8</sup>

And a garnisheeing creditor cannot defeat prior assignments of the proceeds of a contract, upon the ground that a part only of the amount to become due under the contract was assigned, and that a contract is an entirety and cannot be split up to suit the convenience of the contractor, as this is an objection which could be raised by the contractee, if at all.<sup>9</sup>

With respect to the question whether or not the recording of an assignment of a contract due or to become due is essential to its validity as against the claim of another creditor subsequently proceeding by writ of garnishment, it seems that, in the absence of express statutory provision to the contrary, recording is not necessary. At least, it has been held that the general registration statutes have no application to an assignment of the proceeds of a construction contract,<sup>10</sup> and that such an assignment is neither a chattel mortgage nor a pledge,<sup>11</sup> within the meaning of the statutes requiring a recording of such instruments.

Wages, salary, and earnings—generally.

Generally, as to validity of assignment of wages or salary to be earned, see Rodijk v. Andrews, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 564, and the note appended thereto. As to effect of assignment of unearned salary or fees of public officers to put the same, when earned, beyond the reach of creditors, see note to Roesch v. W. B. Worthen Co. 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 374. And as to effect of discharge in bankruptcy upon assignment of wages to be earned in the future under contract terminable at will, see notes to Citizens' Loan Assn. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1025, and Levi v. Loevenhart & Co. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 375.

The general rule, like that relating to the proceeds of general contracts, is that, in the absence of controlling statute to the contrary, an assignment of wages or salary earned or to be earned under an existing contract may be made, and that such an assignment, if for a valuable consideration, and with the assent of the employer, is valid as against, and entitled to priority over, a subsequent garnishment by a creditor of the assignor,<sup>12</sup> the theory being that a creditor can be

<sup>12</sup> Lewis v. San Miguel (1890) 14 Colo. 371, 23 Pac. 338, holding that an assignment of wages to be earned under a contract for transcribing certain public records, made to secure certain advances or loans, was valid as against a subsequent garnishment, the assignment having been accepted by the garnishee; Denver, T. & Ft. W. R. Co. v. Smeeton (1892) 2 Colo. App. 126, 29 Pac. 815, holding that an assignment of wages accepted by the employer was valid as against a subsequent garnishment; Augur v. New York Belting & Packing Co. (1873) 39 Conn. 536, holding that an assignment of wages to be earned was valid as against a subsequent factorizing suit; Harrop v. Landers, F. & C. Co. (1878) 45 Conn. 561, holding that a recorded assignment of wages accepted by the employer was valid as against a subsequent factorizing suit; Adams v. Willimantic Linen Co. (1878) 46 Conn. 320, holding that a written assignment of wages due and to become due under a contract accepted by the employer was valid as against factorizing proceedings; Johnson v. Pace (1875) 78 Ill. 143, holding that an equitable assignment of salary due a school-teacher accepted by the school officers was valid as against garnisheeing creditors; Cairo & St. L. R. Co. v. Killenberg (1876) 82 Ill. 295, holding that an equitable assignment of railroad time checks was valid as against a subsequent garnisheeing creditor of the defendant; Wohlford v. Wabash Coal Co. (1911) 164 Ill. App. 185, holding that an assignment of wages to the employer for supplies to be furnished was valid as against a subsequent garnisheeing creditor; Steltzer v. Condon (1908) 139 Iowa, 754, 118 N. W. 39, holding that an assignment of wages was valid as against a subsequent garnishment; Bridgeford v. Keenehan (1886) 8 Ky. L. Rep. 268, holding that an assignment of future salary was entitled to priority over a garnishment brought after the salary had been placed in no better position than the defendant by reason of garnishment proceedings, and that property validly assigned no longer belongs to the assignor, wherefore the garnishee can answer that he has nothing of the defendant's in his possession or, as it is sometimes stated, is not indebted to the defendant.<sup>13</sup> And application of this theory would of itself preclude the garnisheeing of previously assigned wages, where such wages are by the terms of the contract payable in advance.<sup>14</sup>

earned; Willard v. Butler (1834) 14 Pick. (Mass.) 550, holding that an oral assignment of wages was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Gardner v. Hoeg (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 168, holding that an assignment of wages to be earned, which was given in consideration of advances, was valid as against an attachment served after the services were rendered and after the notice to the trustee of the assignment; Weed v. Jewett (1841) 2 Met. (Mass.) 608, 37 Am. Dec. 115, holding that an assignment of wages to be earned accepted by the employer was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Emery v. Lawrence (1851) 8 Cush. (Mass.) 151, holding that an assignment of wages earned and to be earned, given in consideration of advancements made and to be made, accepted by the employer, was valid in toto as against a subsequent trustee process; Hartley v. Tapley (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 565, holding that an assignment of wages to be earned was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Taylor v. Lynch (1855) 5 Gray (Mass.) 49, holding that an assignment of wages to be earned given in consideration of necessities furnished was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Lannan v. Smith (1856) 7 Gray (Mass.) 150, holding that an assignment of wages accepted by the employer was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Macomber v. Doane (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 541, holding that an equitable assignment of future wages by a watchman employed by a city was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Kane v. Clough (1877) 36 Mich. 436, 24 Am. Rep. 599, holding that an assignment of wages to be earned in the future by doing piecework under an existing and continuing contract was valid as against a subsequent garnishment; Hax v. Acme Cement Plaster Co. (1900) 82 Mo. App. 447, rehearing denied in (1900) 3 Mo. App. Rep. 258, holding that an assignment of future wages to be earned under a continuing contract indefinite as to duration was entitled to priority over a subsequent garnishment; White v. Richardson (1841) 12 N. H. 93, holding that an assignment of future wages was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Tiernay v. McGarity (1883) 14 R. I. 231, holding that an assignment of future wages was valid as against a subsequent garnishment, that it be in good faith and for an adequate consideration.<sup>15</sup> And it follows that an assignment of wages, salary, or earnings due or to become due is void as against subsequent garnisheeing creditors if the intention concurred in by both the parties thereto was to leave the fund wholly or in part in the after-control of the assignor.<sup>16</sup>

And in the absence of statute an assignment of future wages is valid although the contract is indefinite as to time or amount.<sup>17</sup> But there must be an existing contract, for the mere expectament of future wages was valid as against a subsequent garnishment; H. T. Chase & Son v. Doby (1898) 20 R. I. 463, 40 Atl. 100, holding that an assignment of salary was valid as against a subsequent garnishment; Worthington v. Jones (1851) 23 Vt. 546, holding that an agreement whereby the employer agreed to support the employee's family out of his wages was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Traders' Bank v. McKay (1909) 2 Alberta L. R. 31, holding that an equitable assignment of future wages by a civil servant (deputy clerk in telephone branch of provincial public works department, town but not a public officer within the meaning of the rules relating to the assignment of wages by such an officer) was valid as against a subsequent process by garnishment.

<sup>14</sup> Callaghan v. Pocasset Mfg. Co. (1875) 119 Mass. 173, holding that wages continually payable in advance, which had been assigned, could not be reached by subsequent trustee process.

<sup>15</sup> See especially Runnells v. Bosquet, N. I. & S. Co. (1880) 60 N. H. 38, holding that an assignment of future wages not based upon an adequate consideration, and made to secure to the assignor the benefit of his wages, to the detriment of his creditors, was invalid as against a subsequent trustee process; and the cases set out supra, note 12.

<sup>17</sup> Augur v. New York Belting & Packing Co. (1873) 39 Conn. 536 (contract to work generally in the ordinary course of employment for an indefinite time); Harrop v. Landers, F. & C. Co. (1878) 45 Conn. 561, (contract for piecework to be done at such times as the employer desired); Stinson v. Caswell (1880) 71 Me. 510 (holding that an assignment of coupons representing work done by the piece in a shoe factory was valid as against subsequent trustee process, tion of earning money under a contract not yet in existence cannot be assigned so as to take priority over garnishment after a hiring and the earning of wages.<sup>18</sup> And an assignment of wages to a firm becomes inoperative by a change of membership in the firm, so as to let in a garnisheeing creditor as against the successive firm, where no notice either of such change, or of a subsequent parol agreement between the assignor and the new firm that the order should continue in force, was given the garnishee.<sup>19</sup>

And as stated in the preceding subdivision,<sup>20</sup> the better rule is that the fact that the garnishee was not notified of a prior assignment of wages until after service of process does not entitle the garnishment to priority, where knowledge of such assignment was obtained before judgment, so as to enable him to interpose the same as a defense.<sup>21</sup> —under statutes.

In a number of jurisdictions statutes have been enacted which expressly prohibit or declare void assignments of unearned wages or salary,<sup>22</sup> and, of course, assignments falling within the inhibition of such statutes would not be effective as against garnishment proceedings. And in a number of other jurisdictions assignments of future wages, salary, or earnings are declared invalid as against third persons, unless recorded.<sup>23</sup> In Massachusetts, however, the statute sub-the trustee having recognized the assignment; Hartley v. Tapley (1854) 2 Gray (Mass.) 565 (contract for piecework); Taylor v. Lynch (1855) 5 Gray (Mass.) 49 (contract of uncertain duration); Lannan v. Smith (1856) 7 Gray (Mass.) 150 (day laborer not hired for any specified time); Kane v. Clough (1877) 36 Mich. 436, 24 Am. Rep. 599 (contract for piecework for an indefinite period); Hax v. Acme Cement Plaster Co. (1900) 82 Mo. App. 447 (continuing contract of employment indefinite as to duration, but calling for a definite salary per year); Traders' Bank v. McKay (1909) 2 Alberta L. Bronson* (1878) 125 Mass. 475 (holding that future wages to be earned under an engagement not existing at the time are not assignable, and that such an attempted assignment is not good as against a subsequent trustee process).

<sup>19</sup> Adams v. Williamantic Linen Co. (1878) 46 Conn. 320, holding that a firm succeeding another firm to which an assignment of wages had been made by an employee of a third company which had accepted the assignment could not hold such wages as assignee as against a factorizing process, against the employer, the assignment not having been validly renewed prior to the service of such process. And see Card v. Ahearn (1905) 18 R. I. 765, 30 Atl. 856, which reaches the same conclusion as the Adams Case.

<sup>23</sup> See Wright v. Smith (1883) 74 Me. 495, holding that the Maine statute did not apply where wages were wholly earned and the work completed when the assignment was made, and therefore that an assignment of wages so earned was valid and entitled to priority over a subsequent trustee process; Pullen v. Monk (1890) 82 Me. 412, 19 Atl. 909, distinguishing Wright v. Smith (Me.) supra, and holding that the statute applied where the employment was continuing, even though the wages in question had been fully earned, but were not payable until a future day; Harlow v. Bartlett (1902) 96 Me. 294, 90 Am. St. Rep. 346, 52 Atl. 638, holding that a duly recorded equitable assignment of wages was valid as against a subsequent trustee process. Mace v. Richardson (1905) 100 Me. 70, 60 Atl. 701, holding that an equitable assignment of future wages was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; *Knowlton v. jects any amount in the hands of the employer in excess of the amount due to an assignee at the time of service of trustee process, to such process, where the assignment "is held only as a security for a debt," as if no assignment existed.<sup>24</sup>

But statutes requiring that assignments of wages must be recorded in order to be valid against third persons do not apply to assignments of wages where the employment has been terminated and the wages wholly earned at the time of the assignment,<sup>25</sup> which assignment has been accepted by the employer prior to the garnishment, as in such case the employer owed the defendant nothing when the writ was served.<sup>26</sup> However, it has been held that where the contract is a continuing one and the wages in question, while earned, are not due, the statute requiring the recording of an assignment is applicable.<sup>27</sup> And an assignment of future wages is valid, and takes priority over a subsequent trustee or garnishment process, even though unrecorded, where the statute requires that the assignment be recorded in the "town or plantation organized for any purpose, in which the assignor is commorant while earning such wages," and the wages in question were earned in an unorganized township.<sup>28</sup>

But it has been held under the Massachusetts statute that an unrecorded assignment of wages is not binding upon holding that an unrecorded assignment of future wages was invalid as against subsequent trustee process; Somers v. Keliher (1874) 115 Mass. 165, holding that money to become due under a contract to furnish labor and materials in building a house constituted "future earnings," and that an unrecorded assignment thereof was invalid as against subsequent trustee process; Schofield v. McConnell (1876) 119 Mass. 368, holding that a recorded assignment of wages to be earned in the future, made in good faith, was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Murphy v. Murphy (1876) 121 Mass. 167, holding that an assignment of wages need not state what it was intended to secure, and that a duly recorded assignment of wages to be earned in the future, made to cover future advances, was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Quimet v. Sirois (1878) 124 Mass. 162, holding that a recorded assignment of wages made in good faith was valid as against a subsequent trustee process, although the assignor's name was so misspelled as to fail to give the contemplated notice to his other creditors; O'Connor v. Cavan (1879) 126 Mass. 117, holding that a duly recorded assignment of future wages signed "Johanna Kavanagh" was valid as against a subsequent trustee process, although the assignor's name was "Johanna Fitzgerald" and she worked and was generally known by the name of "Johanna Cavan;" Hatheway v. Reed (1879) 127 Mass. 136, holding that an assignment of wages duly recorded was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Allen v. Mayers (1904) 184 Mass. 486, 69 N. E. 220, holding that the contract price for the construction of a stable did not represent "future earnings" where the contract had been substantially performed and the stable accepted by the contractee, so as to render the recording of an assignment of such contract price essential to the validity and priority of such assignment over a subsequent trustee process; Chester v. McDonald (1904) 185 Mass. 54, 69 N. E. 1075, holding that a contract to make and deliver a granite monument was not a contract for L.R.A.1916D.

"future earnings" where the personal service of the contractor was not required, and therefore that an assignment of the contract price was valid as against a subsequent trustee process, although unrecorded; William Gilligan Co. v. Casey (1910) 205 Mass. 26, 91 N. E. 124, holding that an assignment of the contract price for sand, gravel, and crushed stone to be furnished was neither an assignment of "future earnings" nor of "future wages," so as to necessitate recording in order to entitle it to priority over a subsequent trustee process; Thompson v. Smith (1876) 57 N. H. 306, holding that an unrecorded assignment of future wages was invalid as against a subsequent trustee process; Allen v. Pickett (1881) 61 N. H. 641, holding that a duly recorded assignment of future wages made in good faith for a valuable consideration, and accepted by the employer, was valid as against a subsequent trustee process; Lewis v. Lougee (1884) 63 N. H. 287, holding same as next preceding case.

<sup>24</sup> See Warren v. Sullivan (1877) 123 Mass. 283, holding that where a laborer assigned future wages as security for obligations incurred and to be incurred, trustee process would reach any surplus in the hands of the employer at the time of the service thereof over and above the amount of defendant's obligation to the assignee at such time; Giles v. Ash (1877) 123 Mass. 353, holding the same as Warren v. Sullivan.

Evidence of a letter which a clergyman attempted to hand to a communicant before service is admissible in an action to recover damages because of his excluding her from participation in a sacrament at such service in which he forbade her to participate; at least where it could be found that she took the letter and became aware of its contents.

religious service and for refusing to allow her to participate in a communion service, which resulted in verdicts for defendant. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Reed Bigelow, for plaintiff:

Plaintiff was an undisputed member of the mission, and as such was entitled to the privileges of the mission, including entrance to the room paid for by the mission for use in religious services.

Canadian Religious Asso. v. Parmenter, 180 Mass. 415, 62 N. E. 740; Gray v. Christian Soc. 137 Mass. 329, 50 Am. Rep. 310; Byam v. Bickford, 140 Mass. 31, 2 N. E. 687.

Plaintiff may maintain this action as an action of trespass for ouster from the premises.

Byam v. Bickford, 140 Mass. 34, 2 N. E. 687; Silloway v. Brown, 12 Allen, 30.

An action on the case is an appropriate action for interference with the rights of a member of a religious society.

The conduct of the constable, Mr. Hynes, was in law an assault.

Plaintiff could not be deprived of her right of membership without a hearing in the nature of a judicial trial.

Christian Soc.* 137 Mass. 329, 50 Am. Rep. 310; Canadian Religious Asso. v. Parmenter, 180 Mass. 415, 62 N. E. 740.

The exclusion of plaintiff from the place of worship was designed and wilful, and therefore agents and principals are alike and jointly liable.

Chambers*, 154 Mass. 330, 13 L.R.A. 219, 26 Am. St. Rep. 249, 38 N. E. 279.

Mental suffering is the chief element of damage in many cases analogous to this; and any insult or indignity may be considered in aggravation of the tort.

Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. Dec. 759; Smith v. Holcomb, 99 Mass. 552; Burns v. Jones, 211 Mass. 475, 98 N. E. 29.

Also the impairment of the plaintiff's capacity to perform labor, caused from illness occasioned by the nervous and mental shock, is an element of damage.

Warren v. Boston & M. R. Co. 163 Mass. 464, 40 N. E. 895; Cameron v. New England Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 182 Mass. 310, 65 N. E. 385, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 86; Millmore v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 198 Mass. 370, 84 N. E. 468.

At common law a member of the Church of England had a right of action on the case if repelled from receiving communion.

The public refusal of the communion by the rector to the plaintiff was in effect a holding out to the world that she was "a notorious evil liver" or had done some wrong to her neighbors "by word or deed, so that the congregation be thereby offended."

Messrs. Charles F. Choate, Jr., William H. King, Jr., and Robert Hale, for defendants:

No cause of action arose by reason of the refusal by the defendant Papineau to administer communion to the plaintiff.

Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 112 Mass. 371; Farnsworth v. Storrs, 5 Cush. 412; Grosvenor v. United Soc. 118 Mass. 78; Spilman v. Supreme Council, H. C. 157 Mass. 128, 31 N. E. 776.

No cause of action accrued to the plaintiff by reason of being refused admittance to the services.

Under English Church law, the rector is entitled to possession and control.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence would have amply warranted the jury in finding that the defendant Papineau, as priest in charge, declined to administer to the plaintiff the rite of "Holy Communion" or to permit her to partake thereof, and that by his authority and order she had been refused admission on the Lord's Day to the building in which religious services were being held. It is contended that for these acts he and the defendant Lawrence, bishop of the diocese, are responsible in damages, and the verdicts in their favor were ordered wrongly. The record shows that the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, of which the parties are members, has a body of canons or ecclesiastical law of its own, by which the plaintiff upon baptism and confirmation agreed to be bound, and under which her rights of worship must be determined. Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 112 Mass. 371; Grosvenor v. United Soc. 118 Mass. 78. By the "Rubric in the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion," the "minister" is given authority to refuse the rite to anyone whom he knows

"to be an open, notorious, evil liver, or to have done any wrong to his neighbors by word or deed." By "canon 40 of regulations respecting the laity." § 11: "When a person to whom the sacraments of the church have been refused, or who has been repelled from the Holy Communion under the Rubrics, shall lodge a complaint with the bishop, it shall be the duty of the bishop, unless he sees fit to require the person to be admitted or restored because of the insufficiency of the cause assigned by the minister, to institute such an inquiry as may be directed by the canons of the diocese or missionary district; and should no such canon exist the bishop shall proceed according to such principles of law and equity as will insure an impartial decision, but no minister of this church shall be required to admit to the sacraments a person so refused or repelled without the written direction of the bishop."

The plaintiff has not availed herself of this right of appeal to the only personage having the requisite ecclesiastical authority to review her standing as a member and communicant, or to pass upon her ceremonial rights in accordance with the principles of "law and equity." Grosvenor v. United Soc. 118 Mass. 78, 91. The letter of her counsel to the bishop, to which no reply appears to have been made, cannot be considered as an appeal which had been denied. It contains only recitals of all her grievances, for the rectification of which his friendly intercession is requested. But if an appeal had been taken properly and the decision had been adverse, the plaintiff would have been remediless, for in this commonwealth her religious rights as a communicant are not enforceable in the civil courts. Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 112 Mass. 371, 379; Canadian Religious Asso. v. Parmeter, 180 Mass. 415, 420, 421, 62 N. E. 740. For the same reason it is unnecessary to decide whether at common law, as the plaintiff contends, a member of the Church of England could sue if unjustifiably denied participation in the communion. See Rex v. Dibdin, L. R. [1910] P. 57, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 517, 101 L. T. N. S. 722, 20 Times L. R. 150; Thompson v. Dibdin, [1912] A. C. 533, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 918, 107 L. T. N. S. 66, 28 Times L. R. 490, 56 Sol. Jo. 647.

Nor can the action be maintained for defamation. Undoubtedly she suffered mental distress, and the omission was in the presence of the other communicants. The plaintiff, however, was not publicly declared to be "an open and notorious evil liver," or to be a person who had done wrong to her neighbors by word or deed. The act of "passing her by" without comment was within the discipline or ecclesiastical polity L.R.A.1916D.

of the church, and does not constitute actionable defamation of character. Farnsworth v. Storrs, 5 Cush. 412, 415; Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 112 Mass. 371; Morasse v. Brochu, 151 Mass. 567, 8 L.R.A. 524, 21 Am. St. Rep. 474, 25 N. E. 74. See Rev. Laws, chap. 36, §§ 2, 3.

The action for exclusion from the church building also must fail. It appears that upon being informed by the constable employed for the purpose that she could not enter, the plaintiff made no attempt to pass, but acquiesced and obeyed the order. The elements of an assault are absent. No intimidation was used, or unjustifiable coercion exercised. By canon 16, to which the plaintiff subjected herself, control of the worship and spiritual jurisdiction of the mission, including the use of the building for religious services, was in Papineau as the minister in charge, "subject to the authority of the bishop." We are not asked to review the action of an incorporated religious society owning property where a member has been expelled without being notified of the charges and given an opportunity to be heard, as in Gray v. Christian Soc. 137 Mass. 329, 50 Am. Rep. 310; nor is any question of a trust in which the plaintiff has a beneficial interest involved. It is not shown that she had any rights of property in the building, the furnishings, or in any contract relating thereto, or that Papineau was actuated by malice or illwill. The manner and time of admission having been within his control primarily, the acts of temporary exclusion are not reviewable at law or in equity. Fitzgerald v. Robinson, 112 Mass. 371; Grosvenor v. United Soc. 118 Mass. 78; Canadian Religious Asso. v. Parmeter, 180 Mass. 415, 421, 62 N. E. 740; Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 660.

The remaining exception is to the admission in evidence of a letter of Papineau to the plaintiff which the jury could find he endeavored to hand to her before communion began, but which she refused to take. It forbade her to partake "until you satisfy me or my successor or superiors of your repentance and amendment." The letter was not in the nature of a self-serving declaration. The jury, from Papineau's testimony that he laid it on a seat in front of her with the request, "I want you to read that before the service goes on," and from the fact that after the service the letter was not found, could say that the plaintiff took it and became aware of the contents. Its admission furthermore could not have prejudiced the plaintiff, as the church canons did not require the giving of any notice. The relation of the defendant Lawrence to the proceedings may be noticed briefly. It is contended that he approved what had been done, and as the acts of his subordinate were tortious he became a joint wrongdoer by ratification. Dempsey v. Chambers, 154 Mass. 330, 13 L.R.A. 219, 26

Am. St. Rep. 249, 28 N. E. 279. But as Papineau did not exceed or abuse his powers no tort had been committed. The result is that in each case the exceptions must be overruled.

Annotation—Liability for refusing the sacraments.

This note is limited to cases where there was a mere refusal of the sacrament as distinguished from excommunication or expulsion.

For review by civil courts of expulsion of member of a religious society, see the notes to Nance v. Busby, 15 L.R.A. 801, and Hendryx v. People's United Church, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1154.

For review by civil court of dismissal or removal of priest or minister by an ecclesiastical tribunal, see the note to St. Vincent's Parish v. Murphy, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 919.

For power of civil court to compel restoration of member expelled by a religious society, see the note to State ex rel. Hatfield v. Cummins, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 945.

Generally, as to the grounds of the civil court's jurisdiction over ecclesiastical controversies, see the notes to Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Stankard, 49 L.R.A. 384, and Mack v. Kime, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 692.

In Dunnet v. Forneri (1877) 25 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 199, the plaintiff brought an action against a clergyman alleging that he had refused to allow the plaintiff to partake of the Lord's Supper; that the plaintiff had been elected a member of the synod and a lay delegate or representative for the church in the synod for three years; that by the rules of the synod lay representatives are required to commune annually on pain of forfeiture of their office; that by the canons of the church each member is required to partake of the Lord's Supper three times a year; that the defendant assumed to suspend plaintiff from his right of membership, and to excommunicate him from being a member, on a frivolous charge, and sought to injure the plaintiff by reading a libelous paper which he declared to be the ecclesiastical sentence against him, during divine service. The court, in dismissing the bill for lack of jurisdiction, said inter alia: "In all this I do not find the defendant charged with the invasion of any civil right of the plaintiff. There is not said to be any emolument attached to the position of lay representative; the status is not a civil, but an ecclesiastical, one. The position of member of the church and the right to participate in the ordinances of the church are also purely ecclesiastical; and though there may be a remedy in England, as in Jenkins v. Cook (1875) L. R. 1 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 80, 45 L. J. P. C. N. S. 1, 34 L. T. N. S. 1, 24 Week. Rep. 439, where the church is established and ecclesiastical courts appointed to administer it, there is no such jurisdiction here. Strong's Lect. 38. If there be any civil remedy for reading the libelous paper, it could only be on the ground of damage to character or standing, and none such is alleged to have been sustained, and no relief is asked for in regard to it." As the defense failed upon the facts, the court declined to allow the defendant his costs.

While not strictly within the scope of this note, reference may be made in this connection to Waller v. Howell (1897) 20 Misc. 236, 45 N. Y. Supp. 790, where the plaintiffs sought to enjoin the pastor of a Protestant Episcopal Church from striking their names from the list of the communicants in the church register, and the court, in deciding for the defendant and in holding that the question was purely ecclesiastical and that no civil right was involved, said: "In their complaint they, allege that 'for reasons addressed to their own consciences, arising out of the known habits and conduct' of the rector, they could no longer accept his ministrations as a priest, and have therefore 'abstained from further attendance at the services of the church conducted by him.' He has informed them in effect that he will not count them as members during their absence, but will strike their names from the list of communicants. The controversy must be settled by the church. Whether or not the defendant is inspired by malice, whether or not the course he threatens is justified by the plaintiffs' conduct, or even whether he has jurisdiction in the premises, are all immaterial to the present inquiry. It is sufficient that the court is without jurisdiction, either to determine who are communicants, or to supervise or control the defendant in his manner of keeping the parish register committed to him by the church, and that the subject-matter of this action and the remedy which the plaintiffs seek in it are beyond the pale of judicial cognizance."

In Laggard v. Stewart (1876) Ir. Rep. 10 C. L. 222, the court sustained a demurrer to a complaint against a Presbyterian clergyman for refusing the plaintiff the sacrament, on the ground that a duty was not properly alleged because the facts from which the duty could be inferred were not alleged; that no contract was alleged; and that an allegation of malice was useless, because it did not show that the defendant was not entitled to do what was complained of. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was entitled to be allowed to participate in the sacraments when publicly administered by the defendant as minister to the congregation on the Lord's Day, etc.

In England, where the right of communion in the established church rests, at least to some extent, upon statute, the question, as is pointed out in Dunnet v. Fornari (U. C.) supra, is a very different one.

In Clovell v. Cardinall (1683) 1 Sid. (Eng.) 33, the plaintiff sued a parson alleging that on a certain Sunday the communion was to be administered to parishioners, but that the defendant, though often requested, refused to admit the plaintiff, and so on another Sunday, etc., to his damages £40, and the jury found for the plaintiff and assessed damages; but judgment was arrested on the ground that the plaintiff had declared for two Sundays, and had not shown that on the second occasion he had asked the parson to administer the communion to him, and the entire damages had been given for both Sundays. The report states that the court did not give any opinion as to whether the action lay, the defendant having claimed that no action lies in the temporal courts for what is merely ecclesiastical and punishable by censure, etc.

In Banister v. Thompson, L. R. [1908] P. (Eng.) 362, 24 Times L. R. 841, a clergyman of the Church of England, after the retroactive act of 1907 legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister, acting under the advice of his bishop, refused to admit to communion a man who had before the act married his deceased wife's sister in Canada, where the marriage was legal and also refused so to admit such wife; thereupon the husband and wife promoted a criminal suit against the clergyman under the church discipline act of 1840, charging him with an offense against ecclesiastical law in refusing the sacrament without lawful cause, and asked that he be canonically punished and condemned in the costs of the suit, and the court of arches held that the clergyman must be admonished for having repelled the promoters from the sacrament, and admonished to refrain from similar action in the future, but made no order as to costs. The clergyman thereupon obtained a rule nisi from the King's bench, calling on the principal of the arches court to show cause why a writ should not issue to that court prohibiting it from proceeding in the matter. Rex v. Dibdin L. R. [1910] P. (Eng.) 57, 79 L. J. K. B. N. S. 517, 101 L. T. N. S. 722, 26 Times L. R. 150, where the court discharged the writ; and this decision was approved with costs by the court of appeal in L. R. [1910] P. 101 et seq. and an appeal to the House of Lords was dismissed. Thompson v. Dibdin [1912] A. C. (Eng.) 533, 81 L. J. K. B. N. S. 918, 107 L. T. N. S. 66, 28 Times L. R. 490, 56 Sol. Jo. 647. The promoters alleged that the reason given for the refusal was the knowing and wilful contracting of a union which was declared unlawful "both by the Church and by the law of the land," and that "by statute 1 Edw. VI. chap. 1, and by ecclesiastical law, the incumbent of a parish may not, without lawful cause, deny the holy sacrament to any parishioner that would devoutly and humbly desire it. The cause assigned by the defendant for his refusal was not a lawful cause, and the defendant in so refusing has offended against ecclesiastical law." The respondent placed his refusal on the ground that the promoters "were and are open and notorious evil livers," within the Rubric (which rested upon statute). There was considerable discussion in the courts as to the effect of a proviso in the said act of 1907, viz.: "Provided always that no clergyman in holy orders in the Church of England shall be liable to any suit, penalty, or censure, whether civil or ecclesiastical, for anything done or omitted to be done by him in the performance of the duties of his office, to which suit, penalty, or censure he would not have been liable if this act had not been passed." But it was held that the proviso was no defense, it being considered that it related simply to matters of marriage.

No cases have been found on the defamation feature of CARTER v. PAPINEAU, ante, 371, though there are cases as to the announcement of sentences of excommunication or expulsion (see, 4 example Landis v. Campbell (1883) 79 Mo. 433, 49 Am. Rep. 239; Farnsworth v. Storrs (1850) 5 Cush. (Mass.) 412; Fitzgerald v. Robinson (1873) 112 Mass. 371; see also in the same connection Morasse v. Brochu (1889) 151 Mass. 567, 8 L.R.A. 524, 21 Am. St. Rep. 474, 25 N. E. 74). And while it is not intended to include generally the subject of false statements of excommunication, reference may here be made to Barnabas v. Traunter (1641) 1 Vin. Abr. (Eng.) title, Action for words (D, a) 15, p. 396, also reported in March on Slander, London, 1674, p. 147, where it was held that an action lies by a parishioner against a vicar who falsely stated in church that the plaintiff had been excommunicated, and that he had received an instrument to this effect from the ordinary, when he had not received any such instrument and the plaintiff had not been excommunicated, it being further alleged that on another occasion he refused to celebrate divine service until the plaintiff had departed out of the church; the court held that this was sufficient although the plaintiff did not show that any man avoided his company or forbore to trade or deal with him or that he had any temporal or special loss on account of it.

It may be noted that in Fitzgerald v. Robinson (Mass) supra, the court in speaking of Barnabas v. Traunter, declared that "it is clear that the case is not law in this commonwealth."

While not within the scope of this note reference may be made to M'Corkle v. Binns (1912) 5 Binn. (Pa.) 340, 6 Am. Dec. 420, which was an action against the editor of a newspaper, one count being made on account of the following publication: "Certificates of religion. Of late we have had a display of certificates to prove that Wm. M'Corkle has been in full standing and communion with the church for some years. I deny the truth of the assertion, and affirm that the certificates he has produced do not prove it. And I further affirm that he has been deprived of his full standing, and of partaking in communion, because of his groundless and infamous assertions. I do not affirm that he has been thus deprived of partaking in communion by any regular act of the regular officers of the church of which he is a member; but do distinctly and decidedly affirm that he has absented himself from the table, and thus prevented the session from being called to investigate his conduct." The court, in declining to arrest a judgment for the plaintiff, said inter alia: "The plaintiff is not charged merely with a voluntary abstinence from the principal sacrament of his church, or being deprived of that sacrament for any innocent or meritorious action, but with an expulsion from it on account of his infamous unfounded assertions. To say of a man in a newspaper that he is guilty of infamous falsehoods is clearly a libel; and is it less so because the elders of his church have found him guilty, or because, in order to evade the judgment of those elders, he has absented himself from the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as is alleged in the paper of the 16th of September? All persons who become members of a religious society are subject to the discipline of that society. The law permits it, and very wisely, because it tends to the preservation of religion and morals. It is understood that according to the rules of the church to which the plaintiff belongs, if he had really been guilty of infamous falsehoods for which he refused or neglected to make atonement, he might after proper admonition have been excluded from the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Now is it possible that, after such an exclusion for such a cause, any man could keep his standing either in the society to which he belongs, or in the world at large? In my opinion he must sink under the opprobrium. I can have no doubt, therefore, of the matter charged in the declaration being a libel."

Reference may also be made to St. Pierre v. Beaulieu (1906) Rap. Jud. Quebec, 33 C. S. 385, where the curé of the parish, at a meeting of commissioners of schools, threatened them that he would refuse the communion to those who voted to re-engage the holding secretary treasurer, and upon an action by such secretary treasurer against the curé the defendant was mulcted in damages by the appellate court in reversing a nonsuit. The defendant's expert evidence was that the curé might instruct members of his congregation in matters of conscience and if they disobeyed in the matter of a grave moral obligation, they would be unworthy of the sacraments, and so in case they voted for one declared incompetent by competent authority; but there was no proof of any such declaration. Cancellation — deed — inadequacy of price.

1. Ordinarily mere inadequacy of consideration is not sufficient ground, in itself, to justify a court in canceling a deed, yet when the inadequacy is so gross as to amount to fraud, or in the absence of other circumstances to shock the conscience, and furnish satisfactory and decisive evidence of fraud, it will be sufficient ground for canceling a conveyance or contract, either executed or executory; the rule being based upon the theory that fraud, and not inadequacy of price, is the sole reason for the interposition of equity.

For other cases, see Contracts, V. c, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — inference of fraud.

2. Whenever it appears that the parties to a trade have knowingly and deliberately fixed upon any price, however great or however small, there is no occasion nor reason for interference by courts, for owners have a right to sell property for what they please; but where there is no evidence of such knowledge, intention, or deliberation by the parties, the disproportion between the value of the subject-matter and the price may be so great as to warrant the court in inferring therefrom the fact of fraud.

For other cases, see Evidence, II. c, 7, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — sufficiency of facts.

3. Milton Bruner, and Katie, his wife, were ignorant Creek freedmen. Milton owned a certain 40-acre tract which he was desirous of selling. Katie owned an allotment of 160 acres, worth from $2,400 to $4,000. C., desiring to purchase land, through his agent, P., entered into negotiations with Milton to purchase the 40-acre tract, agreeing to give him $150 in cash and a good note for the balance. The deed was drawn and acknowledged before P., who was a notary public, and which, after acknowledgment by Milton and his wife, proved to be a conveyance for Katie's allotment, instead of Milton's 40-acre tract. Both Milton and his wife testify positively that they sold the 40-acre tract, and never at any time sold, or intended to sell, Katie's allotment. Held, that the inadequacy of consideration, under the rule announced in the preceding paragraph of this syllabus, together with the other cumulative incidents and circumstances detailed in the record, amounts to such constructive fraud as to require a cancellation of the deed.

For other cases, see Contracts, V. c, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Indians — conveyance of allotment.

4. A Creek freedman under eighteen years of age, although a married woman, cannot make a valid conveyance of her allotment, except under the direction of the county court; and a deed made without such authority is void.

ERROR to the District Court for Seminole County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to cancel and set aside a certain warranty deed made by plaintiffs to defendant Cobb Reversed.

Statement by Robertson, C.:

On October 14, 1912, a motion to dismiss the appeal herein was sustained on the ground that the alleged errors of the trial court required the examination and consideration of the evidence introduced at the trial, and that, the referee before whom the cause was tried not having certified the evidence to the court, and no bill of exceptions having been allowed, this court could not consider the alleged errors relied upon by plaintiffs in error. This defect in the record was strenuously insisted upon by defendants in error in their brief, and was not denied in any manner by plaintiffs in error until after the order of dismissal had been entered and a petition for rehearing had been filed and oral argument had thereon, whereupon a certain agreement between counsel at the trial (which was embodied in the record) was, for the first time, called to the attention of the court by counsel for plaintiffs in error. The consideration given by the court to this agreement resulted in the granting of the petition for rehearing, and the former opinion, dismissing the appeal, is hereby recalled and set aside and the appeal reinstated, and the cause will now be considered on its merits.

The deed was retained, taken, and acknowledged before George Paine, who was acting at the time as the agent of the grantee, and for that reason said deed is void.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 385; International Land Co. v. Marshall, 22 Okla. 693, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1056, 98 Pac. 951.

Robertson, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action by Milton Bruner and Katie Bruner, his wife, to cancel and set aside a certain warranty deed made by them on February 23, 1909, to T. S. Cobb, for 80 acres of land in Seminole, and 80 acres of land in Okfuskee county. Cobb three days later sold the land to James E. Foreman, who is joined as a party defendant, but Cobb alone defends; Foreman resting his title on Cobb's deed, which is good if the deed to Cobb from the Bruners is valid. The Bruners, who are husband and wife, are Creek freedmen, and the land in controversy is the allotment of Katie Bruner. Plaintiffs in error rely for reversal of the judgment appealed from on four separate assignments of error, viz.: First. Inadequacy of price. Second. The deed was taken and acknowledged by the grantee's agent, and is therefore void. Third. Deception and fraud in obtaining the signatures of plaintiffs to said deed. Fourth. Katie Bruner, at the time of executing said deed, was under the age of eighteen years, and any deed made by her while a minor was absolutely void.

It will be unnecessary to give separate consideration to the assignments above enumerated, for that the reasons advanced in behalf of each are so closely related one to the other as to be, in a measure, applicable to all; in other words, fraud and deceit being the gist of the complaint of plaintiffs in error, we will treat the assignments of error as above enumerated merely as subdivisions of one general charge of fraud, and will give to each subdivision of such charge such consideration as it merits.

It appears from the record that these plaintiffs in error, at the time this deed was taken, were ignorant negroes, the wife especially, being a mere girl, wholly devoid of business experience, and possessed of no judgment or knowledge of business affairs. The husband owned a certain 40-acre tract, which he was desirous of selling, and with that intention approached George B. Paine, who was a notary public and justice of the peace at Wewoka, in Seminole county, and who, from his own testimony, was acting as the agent of Cobb, who at the time was county judge of Seminole county. Milton Bruner told Paine that he wanted $300 for his 40-acre tract. Paine, as agent for Cobb, finally agreed to give him $300 for it, one half cash, the balance to be secured by good note. This conversation took place in the Campbell abstract office at Wewoka on February 23, 1909. Katie Bruner was not present at the time the deal was made, but was sent for by Paine to sign the deed with her husband. Both Milton and Katie swear positively that they sold Milton's 40-acre tract to Paine for Cobb, and that they did not have one word of conversation with him or anyone else concerning Katie's allotment; that they had no intention of selling it, but supposed always that the deed they signed was for Milton's 40-acre tract. Paine paid Milton $150 in cash and gave him in addition a memorandum, signed by himself, to the effect that they had coming to them a deferred payment of $150 on the land sold by them. This memorandum did not describe the land in any way, nor did it bear any interest; no payor was named therein, and it was signed by Paine alone, without any reference to his capacity as agent for Cobb. The record affirmatively shows that Katie Bruner did not receive any part of the $150, or derive, directly or indirectly, any benefit therefrom. Cobb, at the trial, offered to pay into court the balance of the purchase price, to wit, $150. The undisputed testimony shows that the land was worth all the way from $2,500 to $4,000. The record also shows that the entire transaction was carried on between Milton Bruner and Paine; Katie Bruner at no time being consulted concerning the trade.

Plaintiffs allege that as soon as they discovered the deception practised upon them they brought suit to cancel the deed; the record showing the action to have been commenced on March 26, 1909, the deed having been executed February 23, 1909. Ordinarily mere inadequacy of consideration is not sufficient cause to justify interference by a court of equity in a case of rescission of contract or annulment of deed; but where, as in the case at bar, the consideration given is so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience and force one's mind to the immediate conclusion that the deed to the land was procured by fraud, it not only is the right, but the positive duty, of a court to interfere and place the parties, especially the innocent and injured one, in the position he was in before the transaction occurred, and it is a matter of no moment whether the fraud was occasioned by the active, deceitful representations, connivance, and acts of him who receives the benefits of the fraudulent transaction, or whether the result was reached on account of the mental incapacity and want of business ability of the one defrauded. The result in either instance is L.R.A.1918D.

the same; the difference in the moral turpitude involved being only of degree.

The undisputed testimony in this case shows that Cobb first sent one Coodie Johnson (who, from the record, seems to be a handy sort of a fellow and a ready witness), a few days before the deed involved herein was executed, to the Bruners to procure a deed for the land; that Cobb gave Johnson $150 with which to purchase the same; that Johnson offered Katie $75 for a deed, but that she refused to take it. Three or four days later Paine, at Cobb's suggestion, put the deal through with Milton Bruner, and gave him $150 and the purported duebill, hereinbefore mentioned, and which was worthless and of no binding effect on anybody. This is all that Cobb pretends to have given for the 160 acres, although the deed imports a consideration of $800. None of the witnesses valued the land at less than $2,400, and there is testimony to the effect that it was worth $4,000; $3,000 being the fair average value thereof.

When we consider all the facts and circumstances surrounding this transaction, the official position held by Cobb and his standing in the community, his superior intelligence and official influence, the fact that he was desirous of procuring this land, and had made other attempts to secure a deed thereto, the further fact that Paine, a justice of the peace and the notary who took the acknowledgment to the deed, and who was Cobb's agent, engineered the deal and paid the money and executed the so-called duebill, which, according to the uncontradicted evidence, was to have been a good note, but which, as we have seen, was a worthless piece of paper, not binding on anyone, and the further fact that the Bruners belonged to an inferior race, were ignorant and illiterate, possessed of no knowledge or experience in such matters, to say nothing of their contention that they had in mind only the sale of Milton's 40-acre tract, and not the allotment of Katie, we are forced to the conclusion that the consideration given for the land was so grossly inadequate as to amount to constructive fraud, and of such character and degree as to require the cancellation of the deed. We might content ourselves by saying, and the record would fully warrant such conclusion, that the inadequacy of the consideration, of itself, free from any other fact or circumstance, is sufficient to constitute constructive fraud of such magnitude as to require the cancellation of the conveyance; but in this case we are not required to base our judgment upon this lone conclusion, for the record is full of other inequitable facts and circumstances that, to our mind, are so cumulative in their character and corroborative of the above conclusion as to leave no room for doubt in the mind of any fair-minded man.

In Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 2, §§ 926 et seq., this subject is treated in an able and exhaustive manner, and the general rule there laid down for cases of this sort seems to be that, while mere inadequacy of consideration is not sufficient ground, in itself, for refusing the remedy of specific performance, yet when the inadequacy is so gross as to amount to fraud, or in the absence of other circumstances to shock the conscience and furnish satisfactory and decisive evidence of fraud, it will be a sufficient ground for canceling a conveyance or contract, either executed or executory. § 927. This rule is based upon the theory that fraud, and not inadequacy of price, is the sole and only reason for the interposition of equity. In the note to this section in the treatise above referred to, it is said: "The rule had its origin at a time when fraud was generally inferred by presumptions of law, and often by conclusive presumptions. In the present condition of the law on the subject of fraud, this mode of formulating the rule seems to be erroneous. The principle is now almost universally adopted that fraud is a fact inferred, like other conclusions of fact, from the evidence; no rule of law can therefore be laid down as to the amount of inadequacy necessary to produce the resulting fraud. Inadequacy of consideration may be evidence of fraud, slight or powerful, according to its amount and other circumstances. When it is satisfactory and decisive evidence, when from the proof of inadequacy the court or jury are convinced that fraud as a fact did exist, then the relief is granted. Instead, therefore, of repeating the usual formula which has been handed down for generations, that the inadequacy must be conclusive evidence of fraud, I have said in the text that it must be satisfactory and decisive evidence; the former mode represented fraud as the result of a conclusive legal presumption; the latter treats it as a conclusion of fact drawn from the evidence, and is therefore in perfect harmony with the theory which now prevails in most, if not all, of the states. The following seems to be the true rationale of the doctrines concerning inadequacy of price: Whenever it appears that the parties have knowingly and deliberately fixed upon any price, however great or however small, there is no occasion nor reason for interference by courts; for owners have a right to sell property for what they please, and buyers have a right to pay what they please. See Harris v. Tyson, 24 Pa. 347, 360, 64 Am. Dec. 661, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. L.R.A.1916D

634; Davidson v. Little, 22 Pa. 245, 247, 60 Am. Dec. 81. But where there is no evidence of such knowledge, intention, or deliberation by the parties, the disproportion between the value of the subject-matter and the price may be so great as to warrant the court in inferring therefrom the fact of fraud. Such a gross inadequacy or disproportion will call for explanation, and will shift the burden of proof upon the party seeking to enforce the contract, and will require him to show affirmatively that the price was the result of a deliberate and intentional action by the parties; and if the facts do prove such action the fact of fraud will be more readily and clearly inferred."

Ordinarily, if there is nothing but mere inadequacy of consideration, the case must be extreme in order to call for the interposition of equity. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 928. As was said above, we would be fully justified in holding that the consideration given in this case, to wit, $150 cash and a worthless duebill, for land worth $3,000, would bring the case clearly within the rule hereinabove referred to; but we are not required to base our conclusion on this one item alone. The whole transaction is so intimately and completely charged with other inequitable instances, incidents, and circumstances as to absolutely preclude any other conclusion in the minds of honest men. Thus, the record shows that Paine, the notary public who drew the deed, and who took the acknowledgment of the grantors, was Cobb's agent for the purpose of purchasing the land; that he opened negotiations leading up to the execution and delivery of the deed with Milton Bruner, who testifies positively that he never talked with Paine about selling Katie's allotment; that after the deed had been drawn and the trade made, he (Paine) sent Milton to get Katie, who was at the company store in another part of the town, in order that she might sign it; that he caused Milton to sign the deed first, and Katie to sign after him; that he paid the money to Milton, and not to Katie; that Sanders Sancho was sent to the Bruners and talked with them of and concerning the sale of Milton's land, and not Katie's allotment. The fact that Milton did not know the description of the land by number, but relied upon Paine to examine the map and secure therefrom the proper description, is also a circumstance worthy of note. The uncontradicted evidence that the land was worth not less than $2,400, and from that to $4,000; the fact that the parties were not of kin, and there was no intent on the part of the Bruners to bestow on Cobb any bounty or gift,—these and many other circumstances, to our minds, bring this case clearly within the rule above referred to, and require the cancelation of the deeds complained of in the petition of plaintiffs in error. Aside from all this, the evidence clearly shows that Katie, at the time she executed the deed, was under the age of eighteen years, and therefore incapable of conveying her allotment. There is much positive and competent testimony in the record to the effect that she was under eighteen years of age, and not a single word of competent evidence that she was over that age. Coody Johnson (Cobb's man Friday) testified that when he went to the Bruners and negotiated a sale of the land, he offered them only $75 of the $150 which Cobb instructed him to give, for the reason that he wanted to wait a few days to get a census card from the Dawes Commission, in order to ascertain Katie's age (Record, p. 32), and yet (on page 44 of the record) he testified that he had known her for sixteen years, and that she was five or six years old when he first saw and knew her. It is on testimony such as this that the referee held that she was over eighteen years of age, notwithstanding the positive testimony of Katie's mother, her stepfather, and herself that she was born on March 11, 1891. Ordinarily, where there is a conflict in the testimony on any material fact, the finding of a referee will not be disturbed if there is any testimony reasonably tending to support the same. We do not think there is any testimony in the record reasonably tending to support the finding, and we conclude that Katie Bruner was not eighteen years of age on February 23, 1909, the day the deed was signed, and that therefore the same is void on that account. This question has been settled in this state by the decision in Jefferson v. Winkler, 26 Okla. 653, 110 Pac. 755. See also to the same effect, Gill v. Haggerty, 32 Okla. 407, 122 Pac. 641.

Katie Bruner, being a Creek freedman under eighteen years of age, could not make a valid conveyance on the date the deed herein complained of was executed, and, the sale not having been made under the direction of the county court, the deed is therefore necessarily void.

This last conclusion is not only corroborative evidence of the fraudulent intent of Cobb in the premises, but, in itself, is proof conclusive of the invalidity of the deed. It therefore becomes the plain duty of this court to give these plaintiffs in error the relief which they are clearly entitled to, but which was denied them by the referee and the trial court. It seems to be a common practice in the part of the state from L.R.A.1916D.

which this case comes, for unscrupulous and designing men to prey upon the ignorant and defenseless, and in many instances the helpless Indians and freedmen. These unfortunate classes have our undivided sympathy, for, with an intelligent and scheming white man, they have an unequal chance, even at the best; but when to this unequal chance is added the dishonesty of public officials, on whom these simple people have a right to rely implicitly for fair dealing and protection, and the duplicity and treachery of those of their own kith and kin, it is next to impossible to prevent them from being most shamefully mistreated and robbed. Ignorant freedmen (negroes), such as plaintiffs in error, have a right to rely upon honesty of purpose and fair dealing at the hands of white men, and this is doubly true as to those who hold official positions of trust and honor; they have been taught to depend upon the superior intelligence and integrity of the white race; and while the law recognizes no distinction of race or color, and is not, generally speaking, the guardian of the ignorant, yet it will at all times, especially in such cases as the one at bar, throw its protecting arms about the weak and defend their rights against the wicked designs of the strong, when the object of these designs is to take an unfair and undue advantage of their weakness and ignorance. We feel that the facts detailed in the record in the instant case are such as to demand at our hands the relief prayed for by plaintiffs in error. We cannot think that the motive which prompted the giving of $150 cash and the worthless duebill to Milton and Katie Bruner for 160 acres of land worth $3,000 (even if defendant's story be true) is of such character as will appeal very strongly to honest men; and when we take into consideration the probability of the truthfulness of Bruner's story, to the effect that they sold only Milton's 40-acre tract, and not the allotment of Katie, words fail us in adequate denunciation of the acts of these persons who are responsible for the present condition. Katie, not having received any of the consideration, is not required to return the same, or any part thereof. Gill v. Haggerty, supra, and cases therein cited.

Having reached these conclusions, it therefore necessarily follows that the judgment be reversed, set aside, and held for naught, and the cause remanded to the District Court of Seminole County, with instructions to enter a judgment canceling and setting aside, fully and completely, the deed executed by Milton Bruner and Katie Bruner to T. S. Cobb on February 23, 1909:

also the deed executed to J. E. Foreman on February 27, 1909, by T. S. Cobb and Lillian Cobb, as set out and described in the petition of plaintiffs in error in the court below.

Annotation—Cancellation of a deed for inadequacy of consideration.

In the present note it is sought to determine whether inadequacy of consideration is, of itself, a ground for the cancellation of a deed, and if so, when and under what circumstances equity will exercise its jurisdiction for that purpose. Inadequacy of consideration is an element present in a very large number of equitable action for the cancellation of deeds, in which other elements, such as misrepresentation and fraud, duress, undue influence, breach of confidential relations, form the basis of the action. This note, however, is confined to the single element of inadequacy of consideration as a ground for such cancellation. In the development of this subject it has been found necessary to include cases in which other inequitable incidents were present, but where the action was based on such other inequitable incidents the case has been excluded.

The note is also confined to inadequacy of consideration in deeds upon a consideration of money or other property; the question of inadequacy of consideration in conveyances upon consideration of care for the grantor has in general been excluded.<sup>1</sup> Sales by an heir of his interest in an estate have also been excluded.

The sale of expectancies and other contingent interests is not exhaustively discussed, since the question is intimately connected with the validity of contracts with reference to such estates, and more logically belongs with a complete treatment of that subject.

Attempts by creditors to set aside a deed of their debtor have in general been excluded.

It is a well-recognized rule that the owner of property may do what he will therewith, assuming that no rights of creditors are involved. The owner may give it away if he so desires. If the gift is perfected, the transfer is valid. This assumes the owner is competent and fully informed as to what he is doing. But assuming that the owner does not desire to make a gift or take any less than the property is worth, what then are his rights when he has actually conveyed it for an inadequate consideration?

An adequate consideration, reduced to its last analysis, is simply what property will bring in the market. There is no absolute standard. The elements that determine it are numerous and varying. Its very nature sustains the uniform conclusion of the cases that mere inadequacy of consideration is not a ground for the cancellation of a deed.<sup>1a</sup> In another form it is stated that inadequacy of consideration is not a distinct ground for equitable relief.<sup>3</sup>

Again inadequacy of consideration is stated not to furnish ground for cancellation, where the parties are in a situation to form an independent judgment concerning the transaction,<sup>3</sup> or understand fully the nature of the transaction.<sup>4</sup>

Notwithstanding this well-established rule that inadequacy of consideration is not a ground for the cancellation of a deed, it is repeatedly stated in the cases that if the inadequacy of consideration is such as to shock the conscience, it does furnish ground for cancellation.<sup>5</sup>

If the inadequacy is not so great as to shock the conscience, the deed will not be canceled.<sup>6</sup> But if the inadequacy

In Jacobson v. Nealand (1904) 122 Iowa, 372, 98 N. W. 158, a suit in equity to set aside a deed on the ground that the grantor was of unsound mind at the time the deed was executed; that it was without consideration, and was obtained by false and fraudulent representations, the deed reciting a consideration which was in fact paid, it is stated that whether the consideration was adequate or not is immaterial, save as such evidence may bear on the other issues of the case.

A consideration much less than the value of the property conveyed was sustained as an adequate consideration in Lewis v. Allen (1914) 42 Okla. 584, 142 Pac. 384, where the deed was executed by the grantor after she became of age, to pass title to property which she had sold to the grantee and deeded to him before she became of age, at which time she received a consideration equal to the full value of the property.

A sale of land on which a tax lien was claimed on consideration that the tax lien be discharged on that and other land sold by the grantor, and still others yet owned by him, will not be set aside for inadequacy of consideration where there is no evidence of a confidential relation nor of deceit, misrepresentation, or mistake, nor of duress or artifice to reduce the price. Chance v. Chapman (1915) — Ala. —, 70 So. 676. The real consideration moving to the grantor is stated to be satisfaction of the demands of the holder of the tax lien on these lands. Neither the value of the land nor the consideration appears.

<sup>4</sup> Storthz v. Williams (1908) 86 Ark. 460, 111 S. W. 804, citing from 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 926. There was fraud in this case for which the conveyance was set aside.

Davidson v. Little (1813) 22 Pa. 245, 60 Am. Dec. 81. It is stated that a conveyance of land for 5 per cent. of its value is very well calculated to fix upon the transaction a serious suspicion of its fairness, but if the vendor was thoroughly acquainted with every fact which it was necessary for him to know, if he was of legal age and of sound mind, if there were no circumstances which gave the vendee an improper control of him amounting to mental imprisonment, if in short the vendee behaved honestly and the vendor was able to act like a free man with his eyes open, the one had a right to sell, and the other to buy, on any terms they thought proper to agree upon.

And see Harris v. Tyson (1855) 24 Pa. 347, 64 Am. Dec. 661, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 634, infra, note 15.

It is stated in Newman v. Newman (1905) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 86 S. W. 635, that a voluntary deed cannot be set aside on the ground of inadequacy of consideration.

<sup>6</sup> Johnson v. Woodworth (1909) 134 App. Div. 715, 119 N. Y. Supp. 146; Eyre v. Potter (1853) 15 How. (U. S.) 42, 14 L. ed. 592 (it then amounts to evidence of fraud). Cases cited in notes 6-9.

The price must be so small as to strike the mind in the light of the testimony, at first flush, as grossly inadequate, and raise the conviction that the property was sacrificed in the market for a price less than its actual value. Walker v. Derby (1870) 5 Biss. 134, Fed. Cas. No. 17,068.

<sup>6</sup> Bevins v. Lowe (1914) 159 Ky. 439, 167 S. W. 422; Dotson v. Norman (1914) 159 Ky. 786, 169 S. W. 527; Walker v. Derby (Fed.) supra. The property was sold for practically what it was worth in these cases.

A consideration of $100 for land shown to be worth $150 to $200 was held not unreasonably low in McKinley v. McKinley (1902) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2314, 66 S. W. 831.

A deed by a lodge of property worth about $3,000 for a consideration of $2,500 cannot be set aside on the ground of inadequacy of consideration. Deepwater Council v. Renick (1906) 59 W. Va. 343, 53 S. E. 552.

Where the conveyance was made years before the action is brought to set it aside, the court will inquire no further into the adequacy of consideration than to ascertain if the price paid is so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience and necessarily imply fraud. Somers v. Ferris (1914) 192 Mich. 392, 148 N. W. 782. Such an inadequate compensation was not made out in this case, where the evidence established that the land was sold for approximately what it was worth.

A consideration of $300 and the cost of a fence estimated to be worth from $65 to $140, for land worth between $500 and $600, is not so inadequate as to furnish convincing evidence of fraud. McDonald v. Smith (1910) 95 Ark. 523, 130 S. W. 515.

A consideration of $8,000 for property is so great as to shock the conscience, it is ground for cancellation. In the cases in which a conveyance is canceled, however, there is some other element, such as a confidential relation,<sup>7</sup> disparity of mental ability between the contracting parties, or incompetency on the part of the grantor,<sup>8</sup> ignorance of business matters on the part of the grantor, or misrepresentation or fraud on the part of the grantee.<sup>9</sup>

Again, it is stated that the inadequacy must be so gross as to strike the understanding with the conviction that the transaction was not fair and bona fide,<sup>10</sup> and it is frequently stated that the in-worth $13,000 does not show so inadequate a consideration as to shock the conscience of the court or raise a presumption of fraud. Talbott v. Manard (1900) 106 Tenn. 60, 59 S. W. 340.

A consideration of $1,000 for land worth from $2,800 to $3,000 was held not to be so grossly inadequate as to constitute ground for setting aside the sale in Fagan v. Schultz (1874) 73 Ill. 529, where the title was doubtful and the grantor, a reckless dissipated person, made the transfer after consultation with an attorney of his own choice, who informed him that he would obtain title to the entire tract for $500.

A conveyance of land valued at $230,000 for $500, by one out of possession, who it is morally certain could not obtain the land without litigation, and whose title thereto is very doubtful, is not for a price so greatly inadequate as to shock the moral sense. Pennybacker v. Laidley (1890) 33 W. Va. 624, 11 S. E. 39.

A conveyance of dower worth $25,000 by one who claimed to be the wife of the decedent, upon a consideration of $1,000, was sustained in Holmes v. Holmes (1870) 1 Abb. (U. S.) 525, Fed. Cas. No. 6,638, where it was not shown that the grantor was actually the wife of the decedent.

A deed by ignorant negro girls of a two-thirds interest in land worth about $800, for a consideration of $300, is not upon a consideration so shockingly disproportionate to the value as to call for the interposition of equity. Storthz v. Arnold (1905) 74 Ark. 68, 84 S. W. 1036. The court states that fraud without damage, or damage without fraud will not do, but it does not appear whether the theory of this case is that a cancellation will not be granted for inadequacy of consideration alone.

A consideration of $1,425 and assistance and attention to the grantor, estimated to be worth $500, were held not to be an inadequate consideration for land worth $350 more. Clearwater v. Kimler (1867) 43 Ill. 272.

See Stephens v. Ozbourne (1901) 107 Tenn. 572, 89 Am. St. Rep. 957, 64 S. W. 902, infra, note 24.

<sup>7</sup>German Corp. v. Negaunee German Aid Soc. (1912) 172 Mich. 650, 158 N. W. 343. It is then evidence of fraud. Conveyance by corporation to its members of property worth $600 for $1.

<sup>8</sup>A consideration of $32.05 for 84 acres of land was held so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience of the court in Perkins v. Scott (1867) 23 Iowa, 237. The value of the land is not given. On this point it is stated the evidence was conflicting. L.R.A.1916D.

ing, the court arrived at the conclusion that the consideration was so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience. In addition to the inadequacy of price, however, there was incompetency of the grantor from mental disturbance which partially affected her reason and rendered her unfit for business.

In an action to rescind a deed on the ground of fraud, a consideration of $75 for property worth $1,000 is stated to be greatly disproportionate. In addition to this there was proof of old age on the part of the grantor, and also great mental weakness and imbecility. Hodges v. Wilson (1914) 165 N. C. 323, 81 S. E. 340.

A consideration of $1,250, some worthless mining stock, and a house and lot encumbered for more than they were worth, for a farm worth $12,500, was held to be so inadequate as to shock the conscience of a court of equity and stamp the whole transaction with fraud from its inception, where the grantor was a weak-minded individual. The deed was accordingly set aside. Fecht v. Freeman (1911) 251 Ill. 84, 95 N. E. 1043.

<sup>9</sup>Sherman v. Glick (1914) 71 Or. 451, 142 Pac. 606, rescinding a conveyance of property worth $3,000 by a woman ignorant of business affairs, upon a consideration of $500 and property worth $750, but represented by the owner to be worth $2,500.
